MAKE THE FOLLOWING

ANNOUNCEMENT

TO THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA, ASSEMBLED AT THE GRAND CENTRAL PALACE.

That they have produced a film of unexceptional merit. The following gives some idea of the magnitude of the subject:

PRELUDE

"And when He came near He beheld the city." St. Luke: 19.14.

Out of a sunrise, along the Palisades, a white-robed figure, Christ, approaches, and dissolves into The Presence.

PART I
THE EVIL OF IDLENESS

A miserly old man exacts toll from women of the underworld and maintains his son in luxury and idleness at college. Later the son becomes enamored with a girl of Chinatown and unwittingly is involved in the robbery of his father, but is saved by The Presence.

PART II
THE EVIL OF CHEATING

A scene in New York Public School. During examinations one of the students is tempted to cheat in answering her questions, but her "Conscience?" prevails for the better.

PART III
THE EVIL OF GAMBLING

A poolroom scene; the gambler loses all his money while his family suffer at home. A newly awakened "Conscience?" causes him to see his errors.

PART IV
THE EVIL OF DISSIPATION

A Lobster Palace showing the dissipations into which the thoughtless are sometimes unwittingly plunged. A typical New York Cabaret scene.

AFTERMATH

After re-awakening our "Conscience?" in all these scenes the figure of Christ is seen to dissolve into the sunset and disappear into the distance.

EX-CATHEDRA

To the Officers, Delegates, Members, and Visitors to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Convention and the First Exposition of the Motion Picture Arts, Greeting:

I, THROUGH the Moving Picture News, extend a hearty welcome to the Natonal Exhibitors' League of America to New York City, and sincerely trust nothing untoward will mar the pleasure of the visitors' stay here, and that their visit to the greatest city of the world will result in nothing but the choicest recollections of their visit and the hospitality tendered to them by the various firms in the industry. I trust that the deliberations of the Convention will be such that the greatest harmony will prevail and that much good will be accomplished through their deliberations.

Many matters of great import to all will be touched upon and elucidated by the various speakers who plan to address you. Matters of vital interest to the industry will come before you in assembly, and it will need your keenest acumen to properly grasp the situation of the problems you may be called upon to solve. It is not my province as an editor to dictate to you what you shall do or what you shall not do; at the same time, as a friend to the exhibitor, I would like to point out, with your permission, some special work you may accomplish.

First of all, the question of the censorship of films must be uppermost in your mind. Many of you have had to face this problem in an individual capacity as well as a collective one. In your cities, or your state, you have had to contend with people who have been so narrow-minded and so prejudiced against moving pictures that your life has been made a burden, and you have been going about from court to court with attorney after attorney trying to get one injunction after the other stopped, because you have shown certain feature films, or certain regular releases which have offended the good taste of the public, or the prurient ideas of some goody-goody people, who tried to see the mote in their brother's eye and cannot see the beam in their own. The censoring of pictures is, as I have pointed out in previous editorials, under the present conditions an absolute farce, and it will behoove your assembly to formulate some concerted plan whereby a National Censor Congress can be formed, whose word shall be absolute and final.

I have advocated many times the complete disbandment of censorship of films, except by the public themselves, but I have to confess that at the present state of affairs it would be impossible for that to be effective, owing to the fact that, once drop the barriers of the Censorship Board, manufacturers would creep in with films that the News has opposed from its inception in 1907.

Some countries are governed by Divine Right, and the autocrat is absolute, but this, "God's own country," is governed by laws, and if the laws are found to conflict with human rights the laws are repealed, and every citizen of the United States of America ought to feel more than proud of either his birthright or the country of his adoption, that such is the case, and that the motto of the country should be used by every exhibitor in the country and by the delegates in council assembled, and should be so with the Censor Board question.

The only logical solution to thoroughly please the many-sided opinions regarding the industry is that a Congress of Censors should be appointed to carry on the work, and force the manufacturers to toe the line, with films that are a credit, not only to themselves, but to every exhibitor who shows them, so that on this subject I trust your deliberations and the results obtained therefrom will be a unanimity of action and that this question will be settled once and for all time.

Other questions, I understand, relating to your program and to the vaudeville part thereof, will be presented to you. My opinion is and always has been that a good program of moving pictures, of, say, three reels of general subjects and one educational one to form the entertainment, is ample for the price thereof, and that vaudeville is not by any means an elevating part of the program. In my opinion, the vaudeville needs a far greater censorship than do the pictures themselves, and I feel assured, from what I have observed in other houses, that a straight moving picture program has fully satisfied the patrons of the theatre. The question of children being admitted to your houses is another moot subject, and one that requires careful deliberation, and if every member of your body would only act in unison with the various children's societies of your neighborhood, and make your theatres light, the trouble of the admission of children will have entirely passed away, and if these people could be satisfied by the admission of a matron to take charge of the children, who should be allowed only in a certain part of the house, free from the mixture of adults, one of the greatest difficulties you face will have been vanished.

At this exposition your attention will be called to all kinds of mechanical contrivances for the comfort of your house, but may I make an appeal here on behalf of your operators? You all know that not one of you would be satisfied to remain in the coop, called a booth, at present in existence. Not one of you would stay therein for an hour. Then "why not do unto your operator as you would be done by yourself"? Give him breathing space, give him a comfortable room to work in. Much has been written about the fact of conditions and the slavery existing in some factories, but I question if any slave is so hard pressed and oppressed as is the moving picture operator to-day. Let your deliberations take into consideration the changing of the fire laws regarding the booths.

Another point is the fact of musical instruments that you may select to go with your pictures. You will be shown instruments of mechanical device galore in this exposition. None of them are equal to a good pianist who knows his or her business and can put some feeling into the music. I was visiting the Astor Theatre the other night, in company with a musical friend, and, in my opinion, the whole entertainment was spoiled by the enlarged hurdy-gurdy grinding out the music in the orchestra. All such mechanical devices are not only an eyesore but an earache condition to those who have any music in their souls.

The most important question before your body will be that of the election of officers. I am only concerned in your obtaining the best the industry can produce. One fable says, "You may give a man an office, but you cannot give him discretion," and so, in your deliberations for a leader, I trust you will give a man of discretion the gavel; and who is more capable of wielding this gavel than your present president, M. A. Neff? He is a man well tried, "sterling," "hall-marked," a man who has led you from nothing to the present state of organization. He has been tried and not found wanting. He is capable in every respect for work of advancing your interests and looking after all that is best in the industry, working to gain justice and right for every man who owns a theatre. It needs no words of mine to paint him, because words are superfluous. You know him, and knowing him, knowing the work that he has done, what he is capable of and what he can do in the future, is better than any number of words spoken or written. He has led you always forward, and never backward, in the past and right up to the present day. Through his efforts he has brought you to the present stage of perfection. See to it that he still leads you to greater victories, until cinematography is placed upon the highest pinnacle it is possible to attain. Then, and then only, will it be time for you to call a halt and select another general.

Wishing you, your convention and exposition all the greatest and most glowing success it is possible to attain, and wishing you, individually, prosperity in your business, and that you may, if I may re-echo the wish, have such an enjoyable week in New York City that to the remainder of your lives it will remain ever green in your memory.

EXHIBITORS WANT QUALITY IN FILMS

"Reels, fewer in number, better in quality," will be the battle cry at the Third Annual Convention of Motion Picture Exhibitors, in congress at the First Annual Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, to be held in New Grand Central Palace, New York City, week of July 7, 1913.

President M. A. Neff, a warm adherent of a three to four reel program, expects to find strong opposition by exhibitors committed to the theory that it is quantity the public wants, not quality, but from his headquarters in the Imeprial Hotel, the League head is compiling statistics that to his opinion will win many converts.

When a program extends beyond four reels, President Neff argues, eyesight is in danger. To thus imperil vision is to destroy the patronage of the future. "Rushing the picture" begets a haste of mind as well as of body and then—accidents, fire panics!

"Sixteen minutes is the proper time in which to run a thousand feet of film," advances President Neff. "That allows sixty-two or sixty-three feet to the minute. Can you imagine what a futile flicker a picture becomes when it is jammed through in eight or nine minutes?

"For the protection of the people whose support provides a means of making a living for so many of us, this convention should and I hope will agree upon introducing into every state legislature a law compelling this fewer reel program, also an ordinance prohibiting the running a picture faster than seventy feet or slower than fifty-two feet a minute.

"We must discipline exhibitors whose business methods reflect discredit upon the whole body of exhibitors. They must be prevented from bringing blindness to people, whose vision is sacrified to the exhibitor's fear that if he doesn't give a long, and consequently a junk program, that the people will go around the corner to the other fellow's place.

"The motion picture manufacturers attending the Convention and Exposition should consider the importance of a shorter program from the point of view of excellence of production. The figures! Seventeen thousand theatres are running six reels every night, a total of 102,000 reels, in a year's time 35,004,000 reels. I ask—where are stories to come from! Apparently illimitable as is the world of literature and fancy, exhaustion is inevitable. Noveity cannot stand the strain.

"About 5,000 pictures were produced in the United States in the last year. In five years, with pictures running triumphantly rampant in every walk and run of life, on boats, trains, everywhere, there are likely to be 25,000.

"Study of the statistics proves that when an exhibitor runs over three reels he runs junk. Of course, it is human nature for a person to believe that he is getting a bigger money's worth when he sees six pictures than when he sees only three or four. But isn't it possible for them to understand that it is preferable to see a smaller number of superior pictures, run at a rate not vision-wrecking, preserving the dignity and atmosphere of the picture itself?

"To race a picture, so to speak, would hardly be noticeable inasmuch as speed of the objects is expected. But I expect to bring before the convention the fact that when they precipitate through the lens dignified subjects, we will say, 'The Fall of Troy,' the motion picture has failed in its mission of representing art, truth and beauty. Can you imagine flying madly through such dignified beauties and massive effects? It travesties a wonderful thing to have its world-famous characters jumping and hurdling about like manikins.

"The motor, most emphatically, is the best way of running a motion picture machine. When properly adjusted danger of accident is at a minimum. When the machine is hand run the picture progresses according to the muscles, tired or energetic, of the operator. Is it advisable to leave the speed of a picture, an important consideration to the whims of a biceps? The motor establishes a fixed speed and adheres to it. 'Strong arm men' are less preferable than machine accuracy."

Lansing, Mich.—The Theatre Company, Inc., Detroit. Capital, $85,000.

GENERAL FILM COMPANY AT THE EXPOSITION

The General Film booth will be one of the garden spots of the exposition. The design calls for a reproduction of the view looking up the Hudson River from West Point, and the beauty of that landscape is being transferred to canvas by one of the best known scenic painters in the city. The foreground will show a regulation army tent and army "furniture," set in a verdant bower of natural greens, the whole giving an unusually cool and pleasant effect. The booth will form an artistic background for the prominent picture players who will be in attendance during the week.

Monday will be Biograph day and in the evening exhibitors and the public will have an opportunity to meet the players who have been their favorites so long but who until recently existed as unnamed personages. Tuesday is Kalem day and Kalem players will be much in evidence. Wednesday has been set aside for the Vitagraph Company; Thursday for Lubin and Pathe; Friday for Edison and Saturday for the Chicago manufacturers Essanay, Kleine and Selig. Throughout the week the pick of the products of the licensed manufacturers will be exhibited in the General Film Theatre. Attractive souvenirs will be distributed from day to day.

This is the first concerted effort ever made by the General Film interests to round up their players and the best films in which they have appeared, which is in itself a promise that what will be offered at the exposition will be worth going a long way to see.

Directly at the top of the stairs on the main floor of the Motion Picture Exposition, Grand Central Palace, the Gaumont Company of Paris, New York and London, will occupy Booth No. 367. During the period of the exposition, a representative of the Gaumont Company will be present at all times to meet the visiting delegates and others who may be interested in Gaumont films and accessories.

Frederick E. Mortimer has been elected a delegate from Maine, State Branch No. 29 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to represent said state at the convention held in New York, July 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12.

The State of Georgia was permanently and thoroughly organized June 30th, and delegates were elected to the National Convention. M. T. Koch was elected National vice-president, and John Evins was elected president. A full delegation will be in New York to represent the State of Georgia. A big banquet was held at the Kimball House, Atlanta, on Monday night, June 30th, and was given by the Consolidated in honor of the occasion of the State of Georgia being organized. The Georgia exhibitors are coming to New York in force to carry off the convention in 1914, if possible, for Atlanta.

WILLIAM WEST

The well-known Edison character actor, who played the part of an old negro in "The Abbeville Court House," which was just taken in Georgia. It is a fact that the Southern darkies who gathered around to watch the taking of the picture were dumbfounded by the realistic makeup which Mr. West so cleverly contrives.

M. A. NEFF, HIS RAMBLES, REMINISCENCES AND CONCLUSIONS

We left Cincinnati, Ohio, full of enthusiasm and expectation of the many sights that we might see during our extensive trip.

From Cincinnati to Vincennes, Indiana, we viewed the old home of Tippecanoe Harrison, located on the Wabash River. Passing through Southern Illinois, we were reminded at Murphysboro of that great general, John A. Logan; on to St. Louis, where we visited the home that was given to General Sherman after the war by patriotic St. Louis friends, on to Shaws Garden, Forest Park, and there we viewed the buildings left by the Worlds Fair of 1903, and the splendid monument reared in memory of Benton; leaving St. Louis, we came to Alton, Illinois, where General Grant once lived and hauled cordwood with an ox team to St. Louis and sold it in the market; from Alton we go to Springfield, Illinois, where the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, lived; we viewed his old home and stood with head bare in front of his monument in honor to that great patriotic heart that beat for all mankind; from Springfield on to Chicago, where only a few years ago the gumbo and mud was so thick and stagnant water and the mosquitoes were known far and wide, but now a grand city—the third largest in the world—has been reared, as if by magic, with its teaming millions and Western progress, making wonderful strides for supremacy; from Chicago to Des Moines, Iowa, the one capital that represents the greatest agricultural state in the Union; from Des Moines to Omaha, which was settled the headquarters for the Government supply of the Western territory up the Platte, and the scenes of the recent cyclone and the destruction of the mighty wind; from Omaha to Kansas City, the home of the pioneers of the West, the city built upon the hills, the city of the marvelous wealth and the splendid future; on to Osawatomie, the home of John Brown, the martyr to human liberty; on to Dodge City, the town noted for the many who died with their boots on; thence to Pueblo, the Pittsburgh of the West; passing through Colorado Springs and viewing Pikes Peak, that towers skyward; then over the summit; arriving at Denver and viewing the snow-capped mountains in the distance, formerly the homes of the Utes Cheyans; on to Greeley, where a colony was formed immediately after the war by Horace Greeley and General Cameron, the town being named in honor of Horace Greeley, of New York, the great editor. General Cameron located the colony where they really had a rope ready to hang General Cameron for leading them into such a God-forsaken country, but to-day it is dotted in every direction with beautiful homes, and prosperity abounds everywhere. On to Salt Lake City, founded by Brigham Young, where we viewed the Mormon Temple and the lake of salt; thence to Deadwood, where Wild Bill was shot while playing at a game of hides; from there to Laramie City, made famous by "Bill" Nye and his forty liars; from Laramie City to Seattle, the gateway to Alaska and the Yukon; through the icy waters and drifting, deep snow we arrived at Dawson City, and there viewed the beauties of the midnight sun. Leaving Dawson we wended our way back, and by boat arrived in California, landing at San Francisco, the home of the progressive brave and the mechanical builders of a great city, viewing the ravage and the freaks of the earthquake; passing on to Southern California, where the hand of genius has left the magic touch that causes the eye to expand and the soul to cry out at its magnificent, entrancing beauty; on to Los Angeles, so fortunately located and beautiful, not even missing Universal City, where the God of nature hath bequeathed to them that splendid scenery which, in the near future, will be beautiful to look upon; on to Old Mexico, where the scenes of the ancient mines and the primitive ways of mining and the people take one back into the year of 1400, the desolation and financial losses caused by the ravage of war, so easily inspired through the two great potential factors in life—love and hate, love of supremacy and hate of imaginary enemies; on to America, crossing the Rio Grande into the grand old Lone Star Commonwealth, Texas, viewing the battlefields of the war Twelve, seeing the ancient forts and passing on to the house in which Maximilian slept, who worried over supremacy in Mexico; on to Dallas, the magnificent, the splendid and the progressive, the busiest and fastest-growing city of the South; passing through Carsama, the home of Roger Q. Mills, the great free trader of Texas; to New Orleans, the hospitable, historical city, where Jackson waited until he could see the eyes of the British and the victory was won; on to Island Number Ten, where Grant landed his army, crossed over to Grand Gulf, and waded the swamps to the historical city of Vicksburg. The hills and the pine trees around Vicksburg we saw; thence to Birmingham, Alabama, another magic Southern city; on to Nashville, Tennessee, where we visited the home of President Jackson; from Nashville to the historical city of Richmond, Virginia, where we visited Bell Island, the battlefield of the Seven Pines, and viewed the capitol of the Southern Confederacy, where President Davis sat in executive session, and other places located on the James River and viewed the place where Libby Prison once stood; from Richmond to Fredericksburg, where Washington was born, and we saw the home of Martha Washington and the lodge where Washington was made a Mason; from Fredericksburg to Washington, that Lafayette took so prominent a part in constructing, where we visited the Smithsonian Institution, National Library, Capitol and White House, the Mint, Patent Office and other places of note and interest; on to Baltimore, in Maryland, "My Maryland," the song that saved a nation; thence to Philadelphia, the home of Franklin, once the capital of the United States; then to New York, the home of great men and intellectual giants, and the world's grandest and greatest city, the place where Washington, Jefferson and Hamilton camped and planned in defense of America, the great city which in a few years has caused the whole world to take notice that it is not only destined to be the largest, grandest, most beautiful city in the world, but the financial center of the entire globe; from New York to London, the home of Queen Victoria and the country of Gladstone; from London across the channel to Paris, the city that knew Napoleon, Marshall Ney and others. As we viewed the shores of St. Helena we marveled at the escape of Napoleon, and were saddened by the surroundings thereof; on to Athens, where the statesmen of two thousand years ago mingled, and as the rising sun appeared in the East and dispersed the gloom we visited the old coliseum, where the voices and advice of the ancient wise men had resounded two thousand years ago, nothing left to remind the present generation—only a few bats that were flying through the darkened corners and a few loose boards flapping in the wind in various parts. As we left Athens for Rome, it was with a thought of a city that has been rebuilt many times, one building upon the other. In Rome we visit the ancient place where Cæsar and Nero had made such efforts to destroy human liberty and rights and forever establish rule by Divine Right; from Rome we visit Egypt; we view, with great interest, the Pyramids and seek out the seven wonders of the world; we visit with the Arabs; we look upon the ancient Jerusalem, and again face towards Paris, after visiting Bombay, India, Edinburgh, Germany, the home of Bismarck; Pekin and Hong Kong, China; Melbourne, Australia; Tokio, Japan, and seeing nearly all of the crowned heads of Europe, we again turn with a sigh and start for our old native land, with but one thought and one hope and one desire—to again be at home, in the country where the right to freedom is given to every individual, where the hope and ambition of the poorest child may be realized; where the common people may attain the highest honors known to mankind; where the beacon light of liberty beckons all on to a higher, grander and more perfect civilization; where the greatest men, most beautiful refined women and the most glorious natural scenery of any country on the face of the globe is to be seen—America.

All of this travel has taken not only days, weeks and months, but almost two years, and has cost thousands of dollars. Any one to-day may visit the picture theatre, and in two or three nights—in only a few hours' time—may more clearly and intelligently visit all of these places for less than one dollar, and not take the time, expense, dangers and hardships of travel into consideration. In the near future all who attend the picture theatre will be even more thoroughly posted and conversant and familiar with the rules of nations and the environments and conditions existing, and historical facts than those who have given years of time and thousands of dollars to travel. The greatest potential factor in the lives of the human race to-day for the advancement of civilization, the amusement and education of the people is the MOTION PICTURE.

Geneva, O.—The Casino, Geneva's new picture house, will open up for business. Manager Ault.

SAM H. TRIGGER

A representative of the Moving Picture News in an interview with Mr. Sam. H. Trigger obtained from him the following interesting account of his experience and views:

For ten years I have been in the business of providing motion pictures as an entertainment to the people of Greater New York. I am therefore in a position to speak as a close observer of the wonderful advance of this industry. I remember the uphill work the exhibitor experienced but a few years ago to convince the public that a theatre was a proper place and where a family at a small cost could procure a clean and instructive hour's entertainment. Of course the old-fashioned and darked auditoriums proved somewhat of a handicap those days and the class of films provided by the manufacturers are not to be compared with the products of the present time. The educational feature had not been realized and the film-maker contented himself with what we would term now "punk" comedy and "eat-'em-up-Jack" melodramatic subjects. This later on brought upon the scene the presence of self-appointed reformers who professed to see nothing but harm in the moving pictures, but in spite of the obstacles placed in the way of the exhibitors by those who saw an opportunity to get themselves into the public eye by demanding nonsensical reforms, I stoutly maintain that the present high standard of entertainments offered in the motion picture theatres is due to the exhibitors and not through would-be reformers. The owners of motion picture theatres are not made up of the itinerant variety of showmen or the chaps who were in the habit of operating showhouses at summer resorts and the seashore to catch the nickel regardless of the kind of an entertainment they give. The exhibitors as a whole are an intelligent body of men and as a result they see to it that the class of shows provided are free from offense. This is but natural, and I claim that the exhibitors always have been and will continue to be the only censors of the moving picture before they are presented to their patrons, and his patrons will censor him if the entertainment is not of a high order. Regardless of censor laws passed in Ohio and other states, all sensible exhibitors are against political censor boards and will oppose any effort made by those who advocate such a bill. Again I say the exhibitors are the best censors. Is it not to our advantage to give the public good wholesome entertainment. We exhibitors had a hard time in the beginning. The authorities in many places began placing restrictions on the picture theatres, and at times these new laws and regulations became so fast that those not having sufficient capital to make the continued changes were forced to seek other fields of endeavor, but to those who stayed, results have been very gratifying. The gigantic growth of the moving picture industry is far beyond the conception of even the majority of those in the business, for instance, in New York State four years ago, the total number of picture theatres was 591, to-day we have 2,000 with two million and a half of daily visitors out of a total population of twelve million, who spend annually for this entertainment over seventy millions of dollars. Could any person imagine even in their wildest dreams a few short years ago that 25 per cent of the entire population would become daily visitors at the Cinematographic shows. Within a short time, I believe every well-equipped library, every school and every private family will have a moving picture equipment in their possession.

A word in reference to the exhibitors' organization at this time. In 1899 a few exhibitors in New York endeavored to get together and form an organization. The nucleus of that attempt is the present Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which will meet at its Third Annual Convention in the Grand Central Palace next week, and as the majority or a vast majority of manufacturers will be at the exposition there is not the slightest doubt that the friendship between exhibitor and manufacturer will be cemented and made mutually beneficial. The motion picture exhibitors of the City of New York have done quite a great deal of work in the uplift of the motion picture and in combatting laws that were both detrimental to themselves and the public at large.

Stuttgart, Ark.—Kaiser & Lucas, the famous dramatic sketch artists, will open the Airdome Theatre here next week.

Webster City, Ia.—Manager Hyatt, of Orpheum, is making arrangements to conduct an airdome theatre during the summer, and work will be commenced immediately.

KINEMACOLOR AT THE EXPOSITION

Kinemacolor will be prominent in the First International Exposition of the motion picture art at the Grand Central Palace as it was at the London Exposition. For the benefit of those who still cherish a sneaking suspicion that the films are artificially colored a Kinemacolor machine will be exhibited at a booth on the main aisle, together with the "magic filter which puts the color into Kinemacolor"—or rather, shows upon the moving picture screen exactly what one sees through the object of a camera, colors and all.

The Kinemacolor Theatre on the mezzanine floor, where the principal exhibitions of the natural color process will be given at hourly intervals, seats 250 people and will serve to show the great variety of subjects now produced by this company, including dramatic, scenic, fashion and topical. For the opening the following program has been selected: "Tested by Fire," "The Husband's Story," "The Call of the Blood," "Other People's Children," "Among the Filipinos," "Authentic Modes in Summer Millinery," "Peasant Life in Asia Minor," "Sunsets in Egypt."

The National Cash Exhibit will consist largely of Kinemacolor pictures, showing the processes of manufacture at the great factory near Dayton, Ohio, whose wonderful system was the salvation of that city during the recent flood. This theatre is also on the mezzanine floor next door to Kinemacolor.

For the benefit of those who desire to see more of Kinemacolor pass badges will be supplied, admitting exhibitors and friends to the regular exhibition theatre in the Mecca Building, 1600 Broadway, where there will be a continuous performance of such big feature films as "The Scarlet Letter," "Nathan Hale," "Jack and the Beanstalk," "Oedipus Rex," "Everyman," "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "Hiawatha" and "Steam."

The Kinemacolor booth will be decorated with original color sketches, by courtesy of E. M. Gauche, of the Courier Company, while the theatre walls will show a full line of Kinemacolor lithographs and pictorial matter.

LADIES' EXPOSITION COMMITTEE

The official meeting of the Ladies' Committee of the Motion Picture Exposition, held at the Hotel Imperial last Sunday afternoon, ended in a social tea. It was arranged that several rooms be set aside at the Imperial for headquarters of the Committee and the visitors, who are expected in trainloads at the end of the week. President Neff gave a talk and many plans were discussed for the entertainment of women guests, sight-seeing trips and other pleasurable projects.

JUST GOSSIP

By The Mahoney

There has been much speculation as to the identity of The Mahoney, and some criticism as to his methods.

As we live in an era of "limelight," we have concluded to get into its rays, in our proper person, and set at rest all conjecture, so that misunderstandings may be obviated in the future.

Our policy shall prevent two widely divergent characteristics, viz.: principal "booster." when we meet deserving people, and principal "knocker," when brought into contact with pretenders, counterfeits, and "four-flushers," and all persons who down in their hearts know that they are uncertain quantities, and are living in an atmosphere of falsehood and deception.

That we have qualified in the world of journalism, we may state, that our early life was contemporaneous with such brilliant minds as: Alfred Trumble, Archie Gordon, Kenward Philp, Sam McKeever, A. M. Soteldo, "Jim" Connolly, Stanley McKenna, and others of their period, so we feel capable of presenting original matter in an original manner.

* * * *

Glen White has been announced as the new leading man of the "Dragon," late "Ryno" Company at City Island.

Can it be possible that Jack Noble has been so lax in judgment and discernment as to allow Frank Smiley to escape? No! Perish the thought! Frank is too valuable an asset to any studio, for those in control, to relinquish, when once in possession.

We have seen and admired his excellent work in many of the "Ryno's" recent releases, and sincerely hope to recognize Frank's virile and striking personality in their output for sometime to come.

Interesting and timely themes with efficient actors make the really effective pictures; the director in many instances being merely an adjunct or disciplinarian to keep them in check; for actors and actresses who know their art, when "in action," direct themselves.

Many stage directors, be it in drama or the motion picture, enjoy celebrity and distinction through the happy condition of their surroundings when producing a drama or photo-drama.

To illustrate:

What director could fail of happy results even with an indifferent story and bad photography (and we have seen some recently) if a selection could be made from the following named marvelous exponents of the silent drama.

At some time in the near future we intend to go into this matter with greater preparation, for it is a subject of interest and worthy careful analysis, and unless some one "beats us to it," we intend making a story well worth reading.

* * * *

According to recent advices Harold Shaw is not favorably impressed with the talent available for motion pictures on Albion's shores, and it is currently reported that overtures have been made to several of the Mahoney contingent who were prominent at that "home of uncertainty" on Eleventh avenue during his administration.

Shaw's dilemma is not to be wondered at, for the Briton is by birth cold, slow and phlegmatic.

Everything he does is measured and methodical.

This style of theatrical work is all very well when exploited at the Empire, Lyceum, or some kindred place of entertainment under the management of Charles and Daniel Frohman, but in pictures, brilliant epigrams and trite dialogue must be emphasized by action, and the action must be strenuous, be it physical or facial, for motion pictures.

We do not therefore wonder why Harold misses his faithful horde of adherents among the Mahoneys.

We often wondered why the name, Alice, served as an inspiration for so many themes in poetry and song.

For instance:

"Sweet Alice, Ben Bolt" has been a melodious sentiment for decades.

"Alice, where art thou" has been translated and sung in every known language.

Then there is Alice Roosevelt Longworth, one of the most beautiful and universally admired Alices of our time, but——

Alice Joyce, of the Kalem Company, is a close second, with every indication that before long, she will distance all previous and contemporaneous Alices in the race for popularity, for her beauty is of such a delicate and distinctive character it might have served Mendelssohn as an inspiration for his Fruhlingslied, or Schubert, for his Serenade.

As leading woman of the Kalem Company, Miss Joyce occupies one of the most enviable positions in the world of filmdom, and she is as modest, retiring, and unassuming in her private character, as she is justly popular in the hearts of the public among whom she has hosts of admirers.

REGULAR COPS SUFFER FOR RELIANCE COPS' FLIRTING

Manager J. V. Ritchey was called upon to straighten out a case of mistaken identity that threatened to score some demerits against the policemen of the 18th precinct police station. It seems that reports have been reaching the station house that some of the boys in blue were seen going into gilded cafes and talking to beautiful blondes in front of the Reliance studio.

A sergeant of the 18th who is very much on the job made it his business to visit the vicinity of the studio, and was greatly surprised and shocked to see not one but several policemen enjoying a friendly chat with ladies of the Reliance Company. The men did not look familiar to him, and he was thinking the situation over when one of the bluecoats asked him in friendly tones if he "was working for Apfel?" "For Who?" "Why for Mr. Apfel." "No, I'm working for the city," said the sergeant in disgust, as he went in to see Mr. Ritchey about calling up the captain and telling him that the moving picture policemen were the only cops who talked to blondes in the 18th precinct.

HALLBERG A. C. TO D. C. ECONOMIZER AT THE EXPOSITION

A matter of especial interest to exhibitors from all parts of the country will be the demonstration of the much talked of Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer at the International Exposition held at Grand Central Palace. This apparatus will be shown in the booth of the United Electric Light & Power Co., connected to a moving picture machine, affording an excellent opportunity to investigate the high merits of Mr. Hallberg's celebrated A. C. to D. C. Economizer.

BRANDED FOR LIFE

Itala Feature

Revenge relentless, enduring over a score of years, is the major note in "Branded for Life." Through its fast flying feet of film is evolved the answer to the question: "Is the quality of vindictiveness to be greater than the quality of mercy?" Revenge is no new element and since Shylock it has been well vilified as unworthy of place in the noble infinite of the human soul.

In "Branded for Life" is a new twist. Here we have a man who nurtures his scarlet feelings through years of separation from him of his hatred. We are accustomed to having the vindictive relent at the last moment, kiss on his fair forehead the despised one, who is now in his power, and smile benevolently upon a scene free from the shadow of anger. This reconciliation, according to the well-regulated, cut-and-dried dramas is usually effected by some damp-eyed kin of either of the two tussling persons.

SCENE FROM "BRANDED FOR LIFE"

In the instance of "Branded for Life," however, it is an apparition from spirit land which softens the granite heart, again proving that "to err is human; to forgive, divine."

Interwoven along the woof of the leading motives is a romance of two generations. The scenes are laid in the sun-lit valleys of Italy and are redolent of the hot passions, fair skies and scenic beauties of the Mediterranean Arcady.

There is live, rapid action. The story is as fast and interest-compelling as that of racing steeds on the home course. The story preaches a sermon of the kind that Ruskin tells us he found in stones. Its purpose, however, is not to preach but to interest; its delineations of the high and low lights of life purpose giving its spectators the feast for their eyes and minds it so well accomplishes.

Statement from I. W. Cunningham, National Director Loyal Order of Moose, on the Value of Moving Pictures

It is always a privilege and pleasure for me to try to write something for a magazine that is published for the benefit of people who think enough of themselves, their families, and their friends, and their country, to devote a considerable part of their time, their talents and their money to the upbuilding and to the progress of the Motion Picture, which to my mind is intended to elevate human character, to relieve stress and to fill the world with sunshine and good cheer.

Moving pictures are now a part of a great fraternal order, and the Loyal Order of Moose will not only use the moving picture for educational purposes but also use the moving pictures for their memorial services. The great Moose University at Moose Heart, Ill., will teach the children of the Moose members with moving pictures, and the thousands of different lodges will have all their members walk and talk before the camera so that in after years when the lodges are holding their annual memorial services the past and gone members will be brought back to their brothers and we will see them again as in real life.

The dream of the Loyal Order of Moose Fraternity is as broad and as high as the human heart. It reaches from the lowest depths to which humanity may sink, to the uppermost pinnacle of heaven. It goes everywhere ministering light and intelligence to those who need its blessing and the Moose have found that the quickest and surest way to educate the masses as to the aims and objects of our order is by the moving picture route.

Motion pictures of the great university, its wonderful farm lands, its great herds of prize live stock and its beautiful buildings will be made this month and in conjunction with this the greatest fraternal parade of the century will be taken by the camera men at Cincinnati and then hundreds of reels will be manufactured so that the organizers who are preaching the gospel of Moosedom to the people all over the world can take their projecting machines and their reels of pictures and going to the factory, the schoolhouse, and the theatre, can show what an organization that has had the most remarkable growth in the fraternal history of the world is doing.

I would that I were endowed with the power to put my thoughts in writing in such a manner that all could understand that a twentieth century fraternal organization could and does believe in the greatest triumph of the human brain, "The Moving Picture," and that this great order is the first to adopt it for the education of its members and the promotion of its membership.

A CHAT WITH MR. HERBERT G. PONTING, F. R. G. S.

("The Author of the South Pole Films")

In studying the cinematograph with the object of securing an animated pictorial record of the British Antarctic Expedition, I was only carrying out a resolve made some time before, for my cameras and I have been shipmates for over twenty years, and since 1900 I have traveled with them in more than thirty foreign lands.

Cinematography only constituted a part of my work in the Far South. I went there impelled by a taste for adventure and the desire to illustrate a portion of the earth's surface which had never before been adequately illustrated. Captain Scott is the first Polar explorer to make photography a special feature of a great national expedition. He gave me charge of this department, placing its equipment and management in my hands.

In addition to using some 25,000 feet of film—a great deal of which was devoted to animal life and other scientific purposes—I have brought back some 2,000 photographic negatives depicting every phase of South Polar scenery, animal life, and the work of the expedition. It has been a most strenuous two years, and I have returned because there was nothing further left for me to do. Another season could only have added a few variations to the work already accomplished. Practically everything had been "cleaned up," so, as the long polar night was about to settle down once more and the Terra Nova was leaving for New Zealand, I came back to classify and arrange all these results in readiness for Captain Scott's return next year. It is no light task, and I have scarcely had a spare hour since I arrived in England.

No, the series just being issued is by no means the last. The whole of the films will be revised and added to, to make special entertainment, to be released when the news of Captain Scott's success arrives.

The films already issued, or to be released this month, show the progress of the expedition up to the departure of the Polar party for the goal of their hopes. (Incidentally, I would say here that the expression so frequently used in the press and elsewhere, "Dash to the Pole," is very misleading. Nothing could be more inappropriate. There is no dash about it. A Polar journey is a steady fight against all the most difficult obstacles with which Nature can bar the way. Fifteen miles a day is considered a good march, and everyone is tired out at the end of such a day's work.)

The last film of the series, which you say impressed you so, was made at 2 a. m. on November 2, 1911, by the light of the midnight sun, and I do not mind confessing that, as I stood on the great ice barrier that night and watched that little party of stout hearts disappearing into that terrible ice-bound wilderness, a feeling of deep depression came over me, as I thought of all the perils and hardships they must go through before I saw them again. It was certainly one of the most dramatic hours of my life.

After that I turned my attention to the animal work. Dr. Wilson, the zoologist, went on the Polar journey, and therefore could not devote the time he would have wished to his favorite pursuit. I undertook this for him, and with the aid of the Cinematograph, every phase of seal, gull and penguin life has been recorded. A selection from these animal films will be formed into a special series, to be entitled "Animal Life in the Antarctic Regions," and I have no hesitation in saying that this will be by far the most popular of all the Polar films.

So far, only enough animal studies have been introduced to relieve monotony, but those yet to come are brimful of interest, both comical and tragic. I believe that the scenes showing in detail the penguins' domestic economy will provoke much laughter. The best of these films will be reserved until the return of the Terra Nova next year.

Any lad seeing all the films from start to finish will have an intimate idea of how a great Polar expedition is conducted. Expensive books on exploration are only read by the select few, but hundreds of thousands of people will see these films, and will learn from them what they never would have learned in any other way. That was the greatest of all inducements to me in accepting Captain Scott's offer of a berth on the Expedition—to know that people the world over might learn from the Cinematograph film what they never would learn from books, and to know also that if I were successful a firm foundation would be established for animated photography as an indispensable feature in all future exploration work.

I used two cinematographs in the Antarctic, a J. A. Prestwich self-contained machine, and one made by Mr. A. S. Newman, of Newman & Sinclair, Highgate, with reflex focusing. I used both Eastman and Lumiere films.

Did I gain my photographic experience in England? No, very little of it. I have learned most of my photography in one of the finest countries of the world—California. I lived there, ranching and mining, for about ten years, and there is practically no branch of photography I have not studied in that land of sunshine and flowers.

In 1900 I received an offer from one of the leading firms of American photographic publishers to travel around the world in their interests. This offer was followed by others from other publishers, and I have been traveling and illustrating ever since.

These travels involved every possible kind of photographic work, and in every conceivable climate. I have had to make tele-photographs of mountains seventy miles distant, and to go to the other extreme, micro-photographs of almost invisible objects. I have worked in the reeking, stifling jungles and swamps of Java, and in the plains of Manchuria, where the air is so dry that the skin cracks.

I have had many interesting experiences. Once I was weather-bound on the summit of Fujiyama, Japan, whilst photographing, for five consecutive days, being the only white man who has ever had such an experience. My work has at times taken me into the bowels of the earth, and to the summit of Mount Blanc and others of the highest Alpine peaks. Interesting experiences have, in fact, been so many that it would take a large book to retail them. Many of them have appeared in magazine articles, and my book entitled "In Lotus-Land," published by Macmillan the day the Expedition left for the Antarctic, is about my three years of travel in Japan.

Which of the countries I have visited do I like best? Well, as a holiday land, Japan. Flower gardens and the pretty Japanese girls are really more pleasant to photograph than icebergs, you know.

I believe that travel, natural history and such films, when made with judgment and knowledge, prove every bit as popular as comedy and tragedy, and form a welcome relief to the spectators. I am convinced that if more and better travel and educational films were shown, the showmen would soon find their higher priced seats better filled. I would not have the picture theatre turned into a schoolroom, but there is no doubt that many of the travel films shown are woefully lacking in interest.

I intend to devote a great deal of my time henceforth to moving picture work, as I think that in the picture theatre the art of photography finds its highest mission.

Undoubtedly the finest preparation for the cinematograph is to go through the photographic mill. The technique which only long practice can obtain can easily be applied to animated work, but all the technique in the world is of no avail without a good eye and sound judgment. Technique alone will never lead to anything. It is the knowledge of what interests the public that counts. Given that, and the ability to get in, one will find almost any land teeming with interesting features, which, by means of this marvellous invention, can be turned to profitable account in revealing them to those at home who, for various reasons, cannot face or afford the discomforts and expense of travel.

Seeing a really good travel or scientific film is almost better than seeing the reality, if it has been made by an expert, because the expert's eye at once takes in the salient points. He goes for the things that count and discards what matters little. Thus the spectator with no knowledge of the subject is not bored by confusing details.

THE CENSORSHIP QUESTION

Berkeley, Cal., June 22, 1913.

Editor, Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir:

I think I voice the sentiments of every exhibitor, and every patron of every theatre out here in the West, when I say with regard to your recent editorial on the so-called Censorship Board, "Keep up the good work."

Under the circumstances which, ever recurring since the advent of the Board, have rendered that august body of nonentities a laughing stock and worse, the most graceful act they could do would be to resign for good and all.

Will you tell your readers just who created the Board, who pays it, how it is worked, in fact, "Why is the Board of Censorship?" Never mind the personnel; as an organization, what is its legitimate standing? What good has it done? What good can it do? Same answer every time, "Nothing."

If the motion picture industry is to step out of the lowly and humble sphere where it really began, the "nickelodeon" of a decade ago, to the respect that it deserves from those whose respect is worth having, it is high time that these "licensed" and "censorized" and "permitted" things be abolished.

If, instead of a "national" we could have a "rational" Board of Censors, things might be a little better. The terms that should stand for something have in this country, alas, been dragged deep in the mire, until now every little two-by-four laundry or ten-cent eating house is either "National," "United States," "Federal," "Union" or something of that ilk. The Censorship Board is about as truly national in character as a Jap laundry or a London suffragette firebug. Possibly "Notional" would better fit the case.

One often hears a whisper that the Board "gets a hand-out" from the manufacturers. If they do, that is their own affair. If they get no pay, they are fanatics.

Honestly, I believe the Board as a body is conscientious but foolishly self-centred. If one of the censors would make a tour of the theatres out here, give a ten-minute talk about the good the Board has accomplished, he would return to Manhattan a sadder and a wiser man. No, they wouldn't shoot him; that only occurs in censored films, you know; they only shoot "dangerous or predatory" animals in the West, for so runs the law. Nobody would think of shooting a flea, but it is a pest all the same.

So keep hammering at this thing, Saunders, and if you can help to get the nauseating censorship tailpiece and the equally obnoxious "licensed" leaders deleted from the pictures, you will have made more friends than you dream of, and will have accomplished a real national good.

LITTLE RUNA HODGES ON THE ROAD

The little four-year-old star, Runa Hodges, who is being presented in a series of Runa pictures by the Reliance Company, has been appearing for the past week in the larger moving picture theatres in Boston and several other New England cities.

Manager J. V. Ritchey has had so many requests from exhibitors to give their patrons an opportunity of seeing little Runa "in the flesh" that he allowed her a couple of weeks' vacation from the studio to accompany her mother on the present tour.

Much to everybody's surprise, Runa is not satisfied with merely making a bow to her audiences, but insists upon being a "regular actress."

A letter from Manager J. L. Roth, of the Olympic Theatre, Boston, states that Runa walked out upon the stage like an old timer, and in tones that could be heard in the back of the house, told the audience how glad she was to meet them.

Runa's appearance followed the running of the picture "A Dream Home," in which she is shown on the screen in a boy's part with Edgena de Lespine as the beautiful young mother.

GAUMONT'S GREAT NEW CRACKSMAN VS. DETECTIVE SERIES—"FANTOMAS, THE PHANTOM CROOK"

No. 1—"Fantomas Under the Shadow of the Guillotine"

Princess Sonia Danidoff is staying at the Royal Palace Hotel, Paris, and withdraws $20,000 from the cashier's custody, placing the notes in a drawer in company with her magnificent rope of pearls. A few moments after a well-dressed stranger steps from behind the curtains and with the coolest of sangfroid, steals the valuables in the very presence of the Princess, and with a polite bow hands her his card and makes a dignified exit. Upon the card the name "Fantomas" slowly appears.

The police are quickly upon the scene, but Fantomas, true to his nom de plume, has vanished. Inspector Robert Juve is the sleuth entrusted to track the mysterious marauder. But, before Juve has time to move in the matter of the Princess's jewels and cash, yet another escapade of Fantomas is thrust upon him to investigate. Lord Beltham is missing. Juve calls on Lady Beltham and in a man's hat finds the initial "G." With so slight a clue Juve tracks down "Gurn" (none other than the elusive Fantomas) to his lodgings and makes the ghastly discovery of Lord Beltham's dead body in one of "Gurn's" traveling trunks, and a packet of the special Fantomas cards establishes the connection between "Gurn" and Fantomas—they are one and the same man.

Three months elapse. "Gurn" has been tried and condemned to die by the guillotine. Lady Beltham's name has not yet appeared in connection with the case and the story goes that the murder was the outcome of a violent quarrel between "Gurn" and Beltham, yet she is enamored of the gentlemanly scoundrel and sets about seeking a method of escape for him. By means of liberal bribes, the aid of Warden Nibet is enlisted and he arranges an interview between the condemned man and Lady Beltham in a house overlooking the prison. That night a new play has been produced by a famous actor, Valgrand, who acting the role of a condemned felon, adds a realistic touch by making up exactly to resemble "Gurn." At Lady Beltham's invitation, Valgrand, still made up as "Gurn," visits her at 2 a. m. and partaking of drugged coffee is rendered incapable of action. Warden Nibet returns and takes back his prisoner—no longer "Gurn," alias Fantomas, but the unfortunate Valgrand, who goes through all the terrible preliminaries of a criminal's execution, aye, even to the point of being led to the guillotine, before Inspector Juve makes the startling discovery that Fantomas has once more eluded him.

Henceforth it is to be a fight between a clever, scheming, mysterious rogue on one hand and Inspector Juve, Chief of the Detective Department of Paris, on the other.

Le Sueur, Minn.—The Pastime Motion Picture Theatre was formally opened under the management of Troy J. Himmelman and Elmer Lippert, of this city.

Notwithstanding the free advertising that a censor always gives a thing censored, a lot of people don't seem to like him.

Our humble editorial confession of the day is that we always contrive to ascertain whether by any bare possibility an anonymous letter is complimentary before sternly and indignantly rejecting it without reading.

* * * *

One-third of the world's population is said to be regular moving picture patrons. There are now more than 30,000 picture play theatres in the United States, and more than 3,000,000 feet of films are prepared for display every week. Is it any wonder that the city of New York takes off its hat to the moving picture exhibitor. He is monarch of all he surveys convention week—and any other week, for that matter.

President Neff, of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, is a candidate for re-election to that office before the delegates in convention assembled in this city next week. He again deserves the honor of re-election, and the editor of this department, and also the editor of the News, suggest that he be elected for a term of at least two years. This will give him free sway to effect certain reforms which are in the course of development. We know Mr. Neff, and we know Mr. Neff's personal and public history back for many years. He is a clean man; an able man; a conscientious and sincere man; and a man who has the interests of his brother exhibitors at heart. We do not always agree with Mr. Neff's policies. We have the courage of our own convictions and wouldn't give a continental for Mr. Neff, or anyone else who did not likewise have such courage.

However, in recalling the forward strides taken the past year, we are able to assert that the good policies are away in the majority, and that no other man in a similar position could have led the national and state exhibitors' leagues to such power and success. To Mr. Neff goes the credit for the creation of these strong organizations. He should be, and will be, honored again by the election as national president. It would be a grave mistake for the exhibitors to choose other leadership at this juncture. All danger to exhibitors' own interests is not yet past.

Pathe's Weekly will appear twice a week hereafter. Two separate and distinct groups of current events per week will make it possible for even a greater number of people to post themselves on the important happenings of the day. We think the animated weeklies have accomplished much for the moving picture industry during the past year or so. They are directly responsible for attracting a distinct class of patrons to the picture theatres—people who would not ordinarily have become picture pláy fans. The illustrated weeklies have suffered, and these periodicals no longer devote so much space to photographs of world happenings, because the animated weekly has superseded them in this branch of work. The weekly releases tend to educate and entertain young and old, rich and poor. They bring the entire world right before our eyes. The releases cannot come too often for the good of cinematography.

* * * *

The Moving Picture News and Editor A. H. Saunders cordially welcome the exhibitors to Gotham. Next week will be a week of import and many vital questions will be discussed and decided by the exhibitors in convention assembled. We welcome these ladies and gentlemen and hope that many of them will honor us with calls. From the very first, this publication has been devoted to the best interests of the exhibitors individually and collectively, and sacrifices have been made, many a time, because of devotion to their interests. The dawning of a day of better things has come. Exhibitors are to be no longer harried by the powers that be. Exhibitors are sure to come into their own with a fair field and no favor—all for one and one for all. We hope that all these ladies and gentlemen that are with us next week will be instructed and benefited by the visit to New York City. We hope that every hour will be full of entertainment and profit. As we said before, nothing is too good for the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

* * * *

President Wilson is not making any new departure in selecting litterateurs for important diplomatic posts. He has, however, gone further than any former president in the number of men of letters whom he has thus honored. Walter H. Page has become Ambassador to Great Britain. Two popular novelists, Thomas Nelson Page and Meredith Nicholson go to Italy and Portugal. Dr. Van Dyke is selected for the Netherlands, and Colonel Stovall, a Southern editor and author, for Switzerland. All of which leads us to prophesy. Maybe some day when the moving picture literature comes into its own and the composer of photoplays becomes honored and sung, maybe, we repeat, the picture playwright will become the ambassador! We hope so, anyhow. And you, picture playwrights who drop into New York next week to look over the convention field, just drop in on us and we'll talk it over. You are welcome, we assure you!

* * * *

The special agitation regarding the censorship of moving picture films seems confined to certain cities only. Happily, it has not grown universal in character. The Ohio state censorship will doubtless be effective, and it is hoped it will be wisely enforced. There is a clamor against "picture shows" in some quarters that is not justified. The fact is, the motion pictures are probably the cleanest form of all public entertainment we have. It started badly, but the censorship established by the picture companies themselves has resulted in the weeding out of most objectionable pictures. Of course, off-colored pictures will occasionally slip in, as was exemplified recently in New York in the exploitation of notorious "gunmen," but on the whole, there is little ground for complaint. There is far more reason for a theatrical censorship which shall prohibit the exhibition of plays and vaudeville acts which are filled with nasty allusions.

* * * *

There ought to be an absolute suppression of the sex problem play which gains a respectable audience by reason of its presentation at a first-class theatre and by actors of ability and reputation. In carrying out a censorship of any sort, says the Dayton News, owned by Governor Cox, of Ohio, care must be taken that it is not dominated by petty prejudice. According to recent accounts real tyranny has been exercised by the police of Behlin, who have control of the picture theatres. Here are some of the films which have been suppressed: A man slips a sardine into his dessert and refuses to pay for his dinner; held to be encouraging to defrauding of restaurants. A child of the slums picks a flower from premises of a rich man; held to represent crimes of trespass and theft. A woman drops her glove, her lover picks it up and conceals it next to his heart; held to encourage infraction of the law that requires finder of any article to turn it over to the police.

There is crying need for reform and the greatest care must be exercised, but sanity must go with censorship.

PHOTOPLAYWRIGHTS OF CENTRAL WEST GATHER AROUND THE FESTAL BOARD AT HOTEL EUCLID, CLEVELAND

Photoplaywrights of the Central West gathered around the festive board at the Hotel Euclid, Cleveland, Ohio, Saturday night, June 28th, at which time the first photoplaywrights' dinner ever held outside of New York City, and, by the way, the largest gathering of scenario writers ever assembled, took place. Success marked the banquet from start to finish. Good cheer was everywhere. "If this is only the first dinner, what will the second be?" remarked one writer, and the cry in unison from all the others was, "This is only a starter." When told that it was larger than any dinner held in New York City, the "home of studios and writers," there was applause and questions of "Why doesn't Cleveland have studios?" which was answered by Samuel Lustig, president of the Columbia Film Company, that Cleveland will have a studio, to be located on the picturesque Rocky River. Mr. Lustig's company is now furnishing Keith's Hippodrome with current event films of Cleveland.

In the absence of R. P. Stoddard, of the Cleveland Leader, A. W. Thomas, editor-in-chief of the Photoplay Clearing House, Brooklyn, N. Y., was toastmaster. After welcoming the writers to Cleveland, Mr. Thomas said: "The chief word I bring to the scenario writers, both experienced and inexperienced, is that reputation is an unknown quantity in the moving picture plot-making field. 'Punch' is the only thing that sells a story. There are a number of magazine writers, whom you would know were I to mention names, who have been unsuccessful in selling picture stories, which goes to show that it wasn't their names that added strength to the plot; the plot wasn't right and a rejection followed."

* * * *

Maibelle Heikes Justice, of the Selig Polyscope Company, Chicago, was unable to be present, although she had made reservation and had her ticket and Pullman berth purchased for the trip, but she was stricken by the intense heat and her physician forbade her making the trip, but instead ordered her to the country. Miss Justice went to her mother's country place at Quincy, Ill. Miss Justice sent words of cheer to the writers and conveyed also greetings from the Essanay and Selig studios. Mr. William N. Selig's message was that his company was in the market for the best scripts obtainable at highest market prices, the writer being neither limited to style or plot, diversity of story being in demand.

* * * *

"I wish I had time," Miss Justice wrote, "from an author's standpoint to tell of the difference between writing fiction and pictures. I might briefly state, however, that in fiction we write dreams, while in pictures we finally see our ideas into life. But I shall strive to be with you at the next meeting—praying for cool weather—and the great pleasure I would have had in coming to Cleveland would have been in meeting you. I wish you all success, at any rate. The moving picture is the great game, and I know personally that the earnest writer will never receive warmer or more sincere encouragement than from the big film manufacturer himself."

* * * *

One of the most pleasing features of the dinner was the showing of pictures, the scenarios for which were written by those present. While the author of "The Post-Impressionists," Miss Justice, was not present, Mr. Thomas was familiar with the cubist story and outlined briefly the theme of the picture play. The next film, and one that received perhaps the most applause was "The Anti-Fly Campaign," written by Dr. Jean Dawson, of Cleveland. The story features Mayor Baker and May Buckley, and shows the cause of much disease which is due to flies. Miss Dawson spoke on the great need of educational films, dcelaring that "One can't teach the older people, but the children are quick to drink in the knowledge gained from motion pictures."

* * * *

Other films were "Overcoats," by Aaron Bishop; "Ma's Apron Strings," by Mary Blanchard; "Roses of Yesterday," Maibelle Heikes Justice; "The Redemption of Rivers," by A. W. Thomas, and "Two Glasses," a Pilot release, by Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

* * * *

Aaron Bishop, author of a number of comedies, gave a brief talk on his success and what he regarded as the necessary elements of writing salable picture plays. Mr. Arthur Cloud, new manager of the Photoplay Magazine, Chicago, delighted his hearers with a few "funny sizzlers," saying he was reminded greatly of the railroad man, who when called upon to make a speech, said he didn't know what to talk about except that he would take about a minute and "beat it." Mr. Cloud was compelled to leave early for Chicago.

* * * *

Among the number of telegrams and letters of regrets of being unable to attend and sending congratulations were those from Eugene Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, Brooklyn; N. G. Caward, editor of Motography, Chicago; William Lord Wright, Moving Picture News, New York City; W. D. Clark, Columbia Theatre, Marion, Ohio; Will T. Henderson, Chicago; Clarence A. Frambers, president of the Chicago Photoplaywrights Club; C. Hoerr De Packe, writer, New York City; R. E. Frederick, Ashland, Ohio; William N. Selig, Chicago; Cora Drew, Boston; William Armstrong, Springfield, Ohio; Maibelle Heikes Justice, Chicago.

The show was "put on" by A. P. Anthony, of Clevelaid, who has been given the credit for giving more moving picture entertainments of an educational nature than any other so-called exhibitor. Mr. Anthony carries all the equipment of a first-class theatre and was voted thanks for the excellent manner in which he conducted the Central West picture playwrights' exhibition. All the films were furnished gratis by the General Film Company, the Lake Shore and Victor exchanges.

Those registered at the dinner were: Professor C. G. Ames and wife, Akron, Ohio; Stephen W. Humble, Cleveland; Edith V. Considine, Cleveland; Aaron E. Bishop, Cleveland; Kenneth G. Cloud, New York and Chicago; R. A. Magee, Toronto, Canada; W. N. Butz, Cleveland; Dr. Jean Dawson, Cleveland; George H. Scott and wife, Cleveland; Arthur D. Cloud, Chicago; A. W. Thomas, Cleveland and New York; Mary Blanchard, Mrs. Blanchard and Mrs. Cowan, Cleveland; A. P. Anthony and wife, Cleveland; E. H. Painter, assistant manager of the General Film Company, and wife, Cleveland; Samuel Lustig and wife; S. H. Morris and wife; S. Wilk and wife; G. Randal and wife, of Cleveland, and H. Gowans, Pittsburgh.

May Buckley, former Lubin leading lady, now playing at the Colonial Theatre, Cleveland, and Jack Halliday, former picture player, arrived after their performance, but Tom Powers, Vitagraph comedian, missed connections at Massillon, Ohio, and did not arrive until after the banquet was over, which was 1:30 Sunday morning.

Everyone was so enthusiastic over the success of the first dinner that a movement was set on foot at once to have a second dinner late in the coming fall.

Wray Physioc, manager of Ramo productions, is planning some new trick pictures soon to be produced at the Ramo studios. The films will be in 500-foot lengths and will involve educational and scientific subjects. John Arnold, who has been responsible for Ramo's excellent photography, has been experimenting with Mr. Physioc for several months, and they both claim that the result of their labors will be in the exhibiting of trick pictures never before attempted in cinematography.

GAFFNEY'S GLADIATOR

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Majestic Release)

"FOR heaven's sake, Jack, what's the matter? You look as lifeless and woebegone as a last year's bird's nest. What's troubling your little heart this morning?" Billy Brown swung himself to a table and lighted a cigarette.

"Nothing at all." Jack heaved a sigh that greatly belied his words.

"Go ahead with it. Get it out of your system," insisted Billy, paying no attention whatever to Jack's denial.

Jack wheeled on his chum. "Well, if you've got to know I'll tell you. I'm in a mess—a big mess."

"Rather indefinite, my boy, considering I've never known you to be in anything else."

"Oh, go to the devil! Lots of good you are to a fellow in trouble."

"Beg your pardon, old chap," said Billy seriously; "what's the matter? You're not in love again, are you?"

"No!" thundered Jack. "I'm in real trouble."

"Well?" questioned Billy.

Jack threw himself on a couch with a sigh that was almost a groan. "I'm an awful liar, Billy," he announced.

Billy roared with merriment. "Why is that beginning to trouble you? Been to a revival or something? You must have got religion in the good old way."

"All right, go ahead and call me a liar if you want to," Jack answered with exaggerated dignity.

"I'm not calling you one. You called yourself one. Of course I'd never have known you were guilty of such crimes if you hadn't confessed."

Jack turned his face to the wall, and silence reigned in the room for several minutes. When he turned toward his friend again he said:

"Say, Billy, old boy, I've got to tell you about it sometime so I might as well do it now."

Billy smoked on.

"You have known all along that my uncle was sending me allowances haven't you?"

"Yep."

"And you knew that I was intending to study sculpture."

"Sure, I've known that for over a year."

Jack sat up on the couch. "Well," he said, as though making a confession, "my uncle has been sending me money because I was supposed to be studying. If I had not been he would not have sent one-tenth as much."

"Well?" asked Billy calmly.

"Well, you idiot, I've been getting in deeper and deeper. A few weeks ago he asked me what I was working on. I wrote him I was doing a life-sized statue. Then he wanted to know what the statue was and I told him Apollo."

"Well, that sound all right to me. Where's the trouble?" asked Billy.

Jack groaned. "The trouble is coming. This morning I had a night letter that froze my blood. Listen, 'Will be in New York Wednesday P. M. Will bring friend, art connoisseur, to see your statue. Uncle.' Now, will you be serious?"

At last Billy was entirely serious. His voice sank almost to a whisper. "Say, old man, what you going to do?"

"Lunatic! That's what I want you to tell me."

"How do I know?"

"Well, you've got to think. My brain's worn out."

Billy lighted another cigarette and sat thoughtfully swinging his legs, while Jack paced nervously up and down the room.

"Great Scott, Jack, be still. How can a fellow think with you pacing around here like a caged lion?"

"Well, have you thought of any way out?"

"No! I almost had a way, but you make so much noise."

"What was it?"

"I don't know, I didn't get it."

Again Billy set to work to think, and Jack stood by the window nervously watching him, afraid to move for fear of disturbing the precious plan that might be forming in his friend's sleek head.

"I've got it!" cried Billy, springing into the air. "Get somebody to pose for you as the statue. Impersonate it, I mean."

Jack looked at his friend with mingled pity and scorn. "Billy, you're an ass."

"All right. It's the best I can do."

"Is that all you can think of?"

"Yes. How could you expect anything more to come from an ass's head?"

"I beg your pardon, Billy, old friend," apologized Jack. "Please forgive me. My head is in a whirl. Do you suppose I could get anybody to do such a thing?"

"You bet you could if you paid well."

"But he'd have to be nearly perfect."

"Yes, that's so," agreed Billy.

"Billy!" cried Jack in ecstasy.

"For heaven's sake, what's the matter?"

"You're the very man."

"Now who's crazy?"

"Billy," continued Jack, "you're the man destined by Fate for that job. You have a fine figure in the altogether, and you understand the seriousnesss of the situation as no hired model could. Won't you do it, Billy? You suggested it, you know."

"Who's crazy now, I'd like to know?"

"Ah, Billy, dear old chum, you won't desert me, will you?"

"That's right; work on my feelings. What would I look like standing up there, stitch, stark naked?"

"Oh, you would be beautiful," Jack assured him. "Why, all my neglected artistic instinct comes back at the very thought."

"Artistic instinct! You're a little late with it. You had better have stood me up and looked at me long ago, and then you wouldn't be in all this trouble."

Jack had relaxed into mournful silence.

When Billy saw him pathetically giving up his last hope he relented a little.

"Couldn't I have anything at all on?" he asked.

Jack brightened a little.

"Yes, you could have a—a bow and arrow or—or—oh, what was the thing he carried? Well, something, anyway. And then you wouldn't really be uncovered, for of course you would have to have some whiting all over you to make you look plastery."

"Some what?" almost screamed Billy. "That whitewashy stuff like the girls put on their arms and necks at night?"

"Well, something like that, only I'd put it on with a brush, so it would stick better."

"Say, do you take me for the back fence? This business must have turned your head, Jack."

"Ah, now, Billy, don't back out," pleaded Jack.

"I haven't backed in yet."

"But you will, Billy. I know you will. You wouldn't leave me in the lurch. You helped me to spend most of uncle's money, you know, and it's only fair to help me out."

"Oh, all right, I'll do it, but I expect to die. I've heard of people dying from having themselves all plastered over with something. Maybe my own skin would do."

"No, it wouldn't. But the stuff won't hurt you. Don't the girls plaster themselves up with things?"

"Yes, but not all over. Anyway, they can stand anything."

"And so can you, Billy, dear, in a good cause. I'll promise to scrub you after they have gone."

"Well, if I'm going to do the Greek god act, I'd like to know what kind of position I've got to take. Don't give me that one flying on the one toe; my toe's sore."

"That's not Apollo, idiot, that's Mercury. I wish we could find an obscure Apollo, then the bloomin' corner sewer wouldn't me so familiar with the position. Say, Billy, don't you remember some of those Apollos we learned about in that History of Art course?"

"Don't remember I studied it."

"Well, you did, and I believe if I dig around a while I can find my book."

"All right, dig. I'm going to rest. Goodness knows I'll need a little reserve strength before the night's over."

Billy threw himself on the couch, while Jack searched the obscure corners for the book.

Before long Jack emerged, covered with dust. In his hand was the coveted book. He searched through the leaves until he came to the Apollos.

Billy rolled over and looked over his chum's shoulder. "There!" he exclaimed, pointing to a picture of Apollo Belvedere, "why not take him? You could take that drapery he's got going to waste there and put it over me to make me look more modest."

"Don't be a worse idiot than you can help, Billy,'" Jack said disgustedly. "Don't you know the old man would know I'd tampered with it?"

"Well, there, what's that one?"

Jack examined a tiny picture in one corner of the page. "That's an Apollo all right, but it doesn't say what his other name is. He must be obscure or they wouldn't put him in here so little."

"But he hasn't any drapery," complained Billy.

"That's of no consequence."

"Maybe not to you, but I've got to stand up there before those old guys in all my whitewashed nakedness; and maybe some of your friends will drop in for a pleasant evening."

"Don't you trouble about that," comforted Jack. "I promise you if anybody else comes I'll draw the curtains. Now come along and skin off."

"It's too early. What time do you expect the lobsters?"

"Well, it's four o'clock now, and the telegram said they would be here this evening. You've got to practice, you know."

Billy sighed and began to take off his clothes. When he reached his underwear he stopped.

"What are you stopping for?" asked Jack. "You don't think Apollo wore union suits, do you? You needn't pretend to be so modest. Didn't you show yourself with next to nothing on at the athletic contests? Come on, we've got no time to lose."

Billy obeyed and they went to work at the pose. The statue was to be placed in an alcove hung with dark curtains, and portières in front were ready for any emergency.

After an hour's posing Jack prepared the wash.

"What is that stuff?" inquired Billy anxiously.

"Don't worry. It's all right. I've had it a long time. A friend of mine had it to whiten his casts. He said it was the stuff they used when they did the living-picture stunt in circuses."

"Well, I'm resigned. Do your worst," groaned Billy.

Jack took a broad brush and began. Billy yelled, pleaded and groaned, but the work went steadily on.

"Now don't move," commanded Jack when he had finished. "If you do you'll crack."

"Oh, Lord, do I have to stand like this until they come?"

"Stand in an easy position until the bell rings and then you'll be dry and can take your pose at the last minute."

Billy meekly obeyed. It was not long until the doorbell told them that the dreaded hour had come. The pose was taken and Jack went to the door.

Billy heard the greetings from his alcove. "Why, my dear Jack, I'm glad to see you looking so well. Work must agree with you."

"I am well, Uncle, thank you. The life here does agree with me."

"This is Mr. Marshal. He is a great art lover and quite a critic."

"I feel greatly flattered, Mr. Marshal, that you think it worth your while to come to see my poor efforts."

"Well, Jack, you had better show us the statue at once, for this is a flying visit. Mr. Marshal and I must talk over some business to-night."

"Thank heaven for that," breathed the statue behind the curtain.

Jack drew the portières and stood waiting in a nervous chill. It seemed that the men would never speak. But Billy was doing splendidly. Good old Billy, he was a brick.

At last Mr. Marshal spoke. "That is really remarkable. You have taken the pose of the Apollo, but have used a living model, have you not?"

"Yes. It seemed to me to give it life."

"Well, that is quite an original idea. It certainly has life. One almost imagines he sees it move."

Jack shot a quick glance at the critic, but saw that he meant nothing beyond what he said.

"Jack, my boy, I'm proud of you. You're all right," exclaimed the uncle, enthusiastically.

Mr. Marshall suddenly turned from the statue to Jack.

"Do you wish to sell the statue?" he asked.

"I had not expected to," Jack hastened to reply.

"I'll give you eight hundred dollars for it."

Jack looked at the statue. It was making wild gesticulations behind the backs of the two gentlemen. A twinkle came into Jack's eyes as he calmly drew the portières and said:

"Thank you for your kind offer, sir; I shall be glad to let you have it."

"Good! Can you possibly deliver it to-night? I have some friends for dinner who leave town on a late train. I should very much like to have them see it."

"Certainly," agreed Jack. "I'll have it around in an hour."

The gentlemen left the address and departed.

"You blooming idiot," cried Billy, coming from behind the curtains, "what on earth do you mean to do?"

"Be careful, be careful," screamed Jack, "you'll crack yourself!"

"I don't care if I do. I'll crack you in about a minute."

"Be calm, Billy. I've an idea. You've got to carry out the rest of this affair."

"Yes, I know your ideas. I suppose you want me to stay whitewashed the rest of my life."

"No, listen. We'll fix up something that looks like the statue and you and I will take it to the house. Then I'll touch you up a little and put you on a pedestal. You can stay until the gentlemen have seen you and then skip. I can hide you some clothes somewhere."

"That's grand for me."

"Oh, come on, Billy. You won't desert me now. Mr. Marshal lives only a few blocks away."

"All right, I'll do it, but I'll never get into such a mess of yours again. What did you sell me for?"

"I had to. I knew if I refused, the guy would think it mighty queer. He never would have offered such a sum if he hadn't been a friend of uncle's. Of course, I'll not take the money after the statue disappears."

Billy sullenly and gingerly got into some clothes and they set about to carry out the plan.

The statue was set up and Jack departed, leaving Billie's clothes hidden behind the pedestal.

The room where the statue stood was next the dining room. Soon after Jack's departure the guests entered the dining room by another way, and the dinner began.

Billy stood it as long as he could. His stomach grew emptier and emptier as he heard the rattle of the dishes. "Those guests will never get a look at me," he told himself, and got down from his pedestal.

Just as he was reaching for his clothes a door opened at the end of the room, letting a streak of light into the darkened room. Billy dived into the shadows and crept along the wall. The door into the hall was covered by portières. He darted behind these and sped along the hallway to the front door. With one bound he reached the street.

With a feeling such as one has in one of those delightful clothes-less dreams, he darted from area-way to darkened doorway until he reached Jack's apartment. Into the room he burst—and into the midst of a party of Jack's friends.

Jack seized a bathrobe and wrapped it around Billy.

"Wine, for heaven's sake, give me some wine to strengthen me," gasped the shivering statue.

They gave him a glass of wine and all raised their glasses with a cheer. Billy arose on his tottering legs to join.

So loud was the cheer that the doorbell was not heard. Into the room burst Jack's uncle and Mr. Marshal. They stopped short with staring eyes.

"There stands the statue," exclaimed Uncle indignantly. "Is this a Pygmalion and Galatea act or a trick?"

It didn't take the gentlemen long to find out which it was. Uncle went up to Jack and said grimly, "You had better bid your friends good-by to-night, for we shall go home to-morrow."

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

McCloskey Interviewed

L. S. McCLOSKEY, script editor for the Lubin Company, of Philadelphia, asserts that one out of a hundred that submits scripts possesses possibilities of being developed into a screen drama. McCloskey in a recent interview printed by the Mirror, is quoted in part as follows:

"A scenario to be accepted must have a new idea or an old one in appealing new dress. While literary ability is not necessary to be successful in script writing, one must possess ability, originality and imagination. Education is helpful. The so-called big writers will not be the scenario writers of the future. Their success is largely due to the dexterity or charm of their style, which cannot be caught in the screen drama. Consequently, the picture plays of the future will be written originally for film reproduction by authors who have developed in the scenario field. Quite a few of the ninety-nine per cent of unavailable scripts are, or could be, made into fairly good picture plays, but owing to their similarity to ones already released or because they lack atmosphere, impossible for us to secure or produce without unwarranted expense, we are obliged to reject them. Some of these find acceptance at other studios.

I can recall many scenarios rejected by us six months ago that we might buy to-day. Every editor can do the same. Very few worthy scripts fail to find acceptance at some time or other at some one or the other of the studios. Fifty per cent of the bad scripts are directly due to the correspondence schools. These schools can readily comprehend from the letters of the applicants that script writing is impossible for them. Yet the schools accept their money and, consequently, we are flooded with useless scripts. The argument of the schools is that, because literary style is unnecessary anyone can write a scenario. Naturally, the idea is the big thing while technique is incidental. But skill and ability are absolutely necessary in selecting and developing an idea. If we considered technique necessary we would not purchase ten scenarios a year contributed from outside sources. I am not an advocate of literary polish in scripts. In fact, I believe strongly in doing away with all unnecessary words."

Our Arguments Substantiated

The above comments from a very able script editor substantiate in different language, perhaps, the arguments we have been advancing repeatedly from time to time. The idea is the thing; technique is secondary. Mr. McCloskey's statements anent the correspondence schools are forcibly put. On one point we differ from Mr. McCloskey. He says story writers are rarely successful in scenario writing. He says a picture is a raw plot stripped of its literary treatment. This is true. And it is for this reason that story writers are becoming more and more successful in the scenario game. A good story writer is the man or woman who can select and develop an unusual idea, a qualification which Mr. McCloskey highly recommends. Most of them can recognize a strong plot when they see it. They are rapidly learning to strip that plot of verbal ornament and submit it in the raw. A dozen or more fiction stars have made good in the picture play writing field within the past six months, and more are coming, or we miss our guess. However, we contend that they will have to stand on their merits alone, because the literary reputation counts for naught in the film writing game.

Merit Sells Them

A Chicago script writer of prominence remarks: "That is the proper spirit about the assumed name on the scripts. I find it no easier to sell a poor story than before I was known. I merely get it read occasionally and get a call down for submitting it. It's merit that sells them." It is merit that sells them, nothing else. And the man or woman from "Mudsock" has an equal opportunity with the Park Row writer, if he or she can deliver salable goods.

His Doctrine Endorsed

Wray Physioc, manager of Ramo film productions, has been releasing some nifty stuff. He gives the reasons therefor in the following contribution: "The acceptance of the principles of pictureplay technology is advancing by leaps and bounds. For a time our ideas of scenarios were unsupported by recent film releases and by the critics. We will from time to time point out practical examples of successful motion picture plays that embody our theories, by published synopses of our releases. We herewith quote a few prominent authorities who voice our views. Charles Frohman: One of the best signs of the advance in modern technique is the disappearance of the sub-plot. Brander Matthews: A plot must deal with a struggle. It must allow a clash of contending desires. John Corbin: Thesis plays are false at once to art and polemics. David Belasco: A good rule for the dramatist is to eliminate everybody he possibly can. In this way do we get simplicity and directness. W. A. Brady: A knowledge of the drama of the past will teach us of the drama of the present. Clayton Hamilton: Tell your story to the eye, for action speaks louder than words; this has been the leading principle of the best dramatists. Augustus Thomas: In the theatre nothing is dependent upon our faculty of visualization. It is all done for us. Wm. C. DeMille: Build your pantomime first, then add such words as will relp the picture."

And the suggestion of David Belasco suits us the best. Eliminate everybody you possibly can. Get the fewest possible characters and have them go about their plots and plans simply and directly. The fewer the characters the stronger the plot.

Pertinent Pointers

Keep your head.

Knowing where to sell is an essential.

If an editor returns your script with a note of advice, thank him.

If you can write good plots the editor will remember you without constant allusion to other sales.

A script must be written with care and intelligence. No good plot was ever "dashed off."

The fiction writers who cannot see the stories they write will never turn out the $300 story, you can bet your life!

The writer who sells can originate. Frequently the one complaining of favoritism cannot originate but unconsciously, perhaps, copies other plots.

There are many disheartening experiences and disappointments to be encountered along the road to successful script writing. If you have a "yellow streak" don't attempt the journey.

We do our best work under pressure. If a script is ordered and we have to hustle, we get along excellently well. Others write best through painstaking labor and revision. Find out which is the best method for your individual case. Infrequently, too much care will ruin a red-hot story.

Until recently the editor merely furnished an idea to the director. Now the script is going to the director in perfect working form with every detail decided upon. Maybe some of you can hereafter recognize your own story on the screen.

The number of scripts submitted to the studios every week has rapidly advanced. Some editors read five hundred a month. The quality has not increased. Is it your fault?

New questions are always appearing and new social conditions developing. Get a new twist to the old idea or study what is transpiring in various walks of life. Material is necessary for good plots.

Cosmopolitan Magazine, highest pay known, generally returns your manuscript within four weeks with a short rejection form. They do not explain why the story is unavailable. Contributors do not expect such action. So why expect the long-suffering script editor to write long letters with every rejected picture story?

Editors like to get "first readings." If your script has been submitted elsewhere first, see that its appearance is such that the second editorial reader cannot detect the fact. It helps, sometimes.

Careful and thoughtful study of picture plays seen upon the screen is sufficient to give you ideas and suggestions and will also afford you technical instruction. Study the way each scene is shown and each character introduced.

When you get what you believe to be an original, an unusual plot, study it carefully, dissect it, try and figure which angle is best in order to obtain its full possibilities. Do not rush off in a flush of enthusiasm and work up the plot. Study it first, foster it, turn it around and examine it from every side. Then, beginning with the first scene, picture clearly to yourself, in fact see each scene and action of each scene as it should appear on the screen, picturing in your mind each move, act and motion, each and every character and even to the required environments. Maybe you will be able to adjust that which is wrong and save the editor from doing it.

Editorial Etchings

Maibelle Heikes Justice wrote Essanay's two-reel feature "The Final Judgment," which has created such interest.

Editor C. B. Hoadley's trusty old typewriter burned up in a fire that recently destroyed the Hoadley home. Hoadley has tried a dozen different makes since, with none satisfactory.

Manager J. V. Ritchey, of Reliance, has interested Frederick Isham, the author, in moving pictures. Isham has promised to write a story especially for screen production.

Reliance has purchased the rights of Forest Halsey's magazine stories for production. Halsey liked the plan so well that he has been a regular contributor to Reliance dramas ever since.

E. T. Lowe, Jr., is with Essanay and has a job known as "Reconstructor of Scenarios." His real work is to put available ideas in proper form for the directors

Augustus Thomas advises playwrights to test every line with the question: "Would I, in that same situation or condition, do that?"

What Is the Use?

What is the use of handing out advice one week and have somebody write in the next asking the same questions? No, film companies will not accept material unless it is presented in proper script form. You can learn the proper form in our textbook or by "sample scenarios" published by every trade journal and magazine in the moving picture field.

A Few Skirmishes

A correspondent, evidently a beginner, placidly informs us that he is writing a script for a feature film company and "proposes to bring into spectacular action, large armies of supers." His plot deals with the Civil War and "contains a battle and a few skirmishes. Shall I describe the battle and skirmishes minutely, or would the following do: Scene 42—Battlefield. Confederate army in confusion, Rapidly retreating, closely pursued by Union army." Unconsciously our friend has, in Scene 42, adequately described his "battle and a few skirmishes." A minute description of a battle and some skirmishes in the Civil War would require a bound volume. But tell us, why is it that the beginner takes a try at feature stuff? Why not start out on the single-reel stuff containing a simple story? There's too many battles and skirmishes on the screen as it is without newcomers in authorship dipping their pens in gore.

Nothing Doing!

We have been approached for our views on the subject of a proposed organization of "The American Picture-playwrights' Association." Name sounds impressive but —nothing doing! We are not in favor of any association of American script writers. A majority of the writers need only proctection from themselves. Our admonition to our friends is, stay out of any "association" and keep the money that would be necessary for "membership fees" to pay postage on your scripts. We rather favor the idea of occasional gatherings of congenial authors in various cities for social and other welfare, but "protective associations," never.

The Greek! The Greek!

Beware the Greek bearing gifts, and beware the film concern that advertises in trade journals and elsewhere offering $1,000 for a feature script. Also, steer clear of the ostensible "industrial" film concerns that advertise for scripts. Good industrial film companies are few and far between. The reputable concerns do not have to advertise offering "$1,000 for feature scenarios." They have their own staffs of script writers, and when industrial scripts are wished an assignment is made. One concern, a newcomer in the industrial field, has been tempting a number of first-rate script writers to develop their best stories around industrials, for which they receive nothing, then the most suitable of these scripts are being peddled around to the heads of big industrial concerns. If the "film company" in question gets a contract, charging for it two or three thousand dollars, the writer of the play is offered $25 primarily, and the price is raised to $50 is necessary. Earnest writers are flooding the office of one or more new concerns with their work, and it means fruitless toil and disappointment for nine out of ten of them, and little or no pay for the few fortunate. Steer clear of unknown "industrial" concerns. We have written a good many industrial scripts in our career, in fact we were a pioneer in this field, and we want those script writers who should know better, to take warning and not be tempted by misleading advertisements. The unusual part of the entire situation is that successful script writers, in a position to demand a contract before submitting industrial work, have fallen for the $1,000 bait and are affording a grand opportunity for the gentlemanly speculators to get the cream of the work to peddle and then buy, if necessary at $25 to $50 per script.

A Safe and Sane Fourth

"'Saved in the Nick of Time' would be a good title of a story about myself, as I was considering the notion of writing a 'holiday' plot for the Fourth of July when your caution came," writes a Chicago scribe. He is going to use the plot for another script that will stand a chance of selling any day in the year. Holiday plots should not be submitted thirty days before time for release anyhow. They should be in the editors' hands at least 90 days previous to the particular time for which they are designed. Why write Memorial Day, Christmas, and Fourth of July plots? You stand a slim chance of marketing at the best. Spend the time on safe and sane stuff.

LEAGUE MEMBERSHIP SLIDE

Members of the Exhibitors' League should lose no opportunity to acquaint their patrons with the fact that a membership in the Exhibitors' League of America is synonymous with projecting the very best pictures obtainable.

There is no better means of informing your audience,—none so direct and effective—as by means of a slide on your curtain. The accompanying illustration is a reproduction of a beautifully colored lantern slide that the Novelty Slide Company of New York (exhibiting at Space No. 32 at the Exposition) have prepared for this very purpose. This slide has met with the hearty approval of exhibitors and hundreds of these sldies are being disposed of at the special rate of 25 cents each, postage paid. Locals can obtain a lower rate by purchasing in quantities.

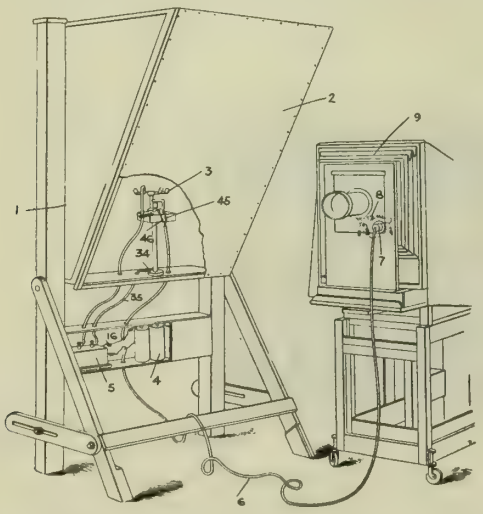
Every member should secure one of these slides and exhibit it regularly; the public will then be enabled to discriminate in attending picture houses.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

When the original Constitution of the United States was adopted the subject of monopoly was approached in a spirit of liberality in so far as authors and inventors were concerned, as is shown by contemporary records of the great popular discussion which preceded the adoption of the Constitution by the several states, and especially by the records of the debates in the Constitutional Convention itself, which indicate clearly that the almost unique distinction of universal approval was accorded Article 1, Section 8, Subdivision 8, which provides that Congress shall have power to "promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited terms, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries." There can be no doubt about this original intention, as interpreted long ago by Chief Justice Story. "Patents for inventions are now treated as a just reward to ingenious men, and as highly beneficial to the public, not only by holding out suitable encouragements to genius and talents and enterprise, but as ultimately securing to the whole community great advantages from the free communication of secrets and processes and machinery, which may be most important to all the great interests of society—to agriculture, to commerce, and to manufactures, as well as to the cause of science and art." This liberal view of the subject has always attained until recently, and is a natural if not a necessary result of the very language and intent of the power thus given to Congress, and which it is now sought to denaturize and prevert by the pending Oldfield bill and other equally questionable measures, notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly demonstrated its ability to curb and prevent any abuse of the spirit as well as the letter of the existing patent law which has stood the test of generations.

The accompanying perspective view illustrates in a general way the flashlight apparatus which is the subject of Letters Patent No. 1,063,778, issued to James Logan



Courson, of Barberton, Ohio. In carrying out the objects of the invention, a cabinet is provided in which a rotating powder-receiving device is mounted, associated with means for operating the same. Arranged in any desired relationship to the cabinet is a camera provided with an electrical switch designed to be operated by the shutter operating mechanism each time that the shutter is opened so as to close the circuit to a sparking device to ignite flashing powder.

In addition, means are actuated for causing the powder-receiving members to be moved one step forward so as to provide a new charge of powder for the next closing of the switch and opening of the shutter of the camera. In this way one or more flashes may be given to each plate in the camera if desired, or the flashes may be given as rapidly as new plates can be substituted in the camera without any reloading of the flashing means. 1 indicates the cabinet having a substantially transparent door 2. Arranged in the cabinet 1 is a flashing device 3 connected to a suitable electrical supply 4 which provides a spark for igniting the powder and also provides current for moving the successive charges of powder to a correct position for being ignited. Interposed in the circuit between the flashing device 3 and the source of supply 4, and also in the circuit of the induction coil 5, are a pair of wires 6 connected by a suitable button 7 to a switch 8; 9 is the camera; 34 is the base of the flash device connected by wire 35 with the induction coil 5; 45 and 46 are battery connections.

What next? About five feet of film is said to be sufficient to record the characteristics and peculiarities in the movement and carriage of the average criminal, and hence we read that the New York Police are to utilize motion pictures (subject to the approval of the Mayor) for the identification of criminals. The films are, of course, to be projected onto a screen when needed for comparative purposes.

Announcement is made of the experimental manufacture of a "neutral" mirror in which "to see oursel's as ithers see us," at least in so far as color tints are concerned. Even the best French plate glass has a blue cast which absorbs pink tints, and hence does not correctly reflect the delicate tones of my lady's complexion and hair, which is presumably the reason why she is deluded into the use of artificial coloring. A Nebraskan is the inventor, and it was only after a long search that he found a German manufacturer that could produce the desired glass, not only neutral but containing the elements of color which neutralize the blue tinge of the silver on the back of the mirror, the scientific problem solved being thus stated: "By balancing the color components of the glass so that the selective absorption in the glass will compensate for the selective reflection of the silver backing, a neutral mirror must result." Much difficulty was experienced in obtaining a patent, because the best mirrors heretofore made are presumed to be perfect and the examiner was not convinced until he had seen the ordinary "best" mirror and the improved "neutral" mirror side by side. Our sisters, our cousins and our aunts may now, by the aid of this new and truthful mirror, see for themselves that:

"To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
To throw a perfume on the violet,
To smooth the ice, or add another hue
Unto the rainbow, or with taper-light
To seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish,
Is wasteful and ridiculous excess."

A novelty recently introduced is a stereopticon which uses films instead of glass plates. Obviously the films would be blistered by the heat if used in an ordinary stereopticon, but this difficulty is obviated by interposing a heat-absorbing screen between the condensing lenses, said screen consisting of a transparent receptacle containing distilled water which eliminates the excess of heat from the projecting light ray.

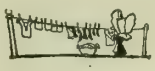
The object of the invention set forth in Letters Patent No. 1,062,081, issued to Charles H. Converse and William H. C. Rider, of Chicago, Ill., is to provide an improved heat-arresting or protecting screen between the light and the film of the picture apparatus, for the purpose of deflecting or absorbing the heat rays, or a sufficient amount of the heat from the light, to prevent the temperature of the film from rising to a dangerous degree; and to provide an improved heat-arresting and color screen, through which the light may be projected to reproduce the pictures in various colors, tints, or shades. The diagrammatic sectional elevation of a picture-projecting apparatus comprises the usual lamp house B, arc light A, condensing lens C, and shaping tube D, while G represents the kinetoscope or moving picture machine, having film reels F, for carrying the film K and the projecting lens L, all of which may be of the ordinary well-known construction. A sheet E, of transparent celluloid, cellulose, fibroid, or similar material is interposed between the lamp and the film, thus absorbing the heat rays which affect such celluloid material, and rendering the use of the celluloid film perfectly safe.

This sheet of celluloid is located near the point where the light emerges from shaping tube of the lamp house, at which point the circle of light is about three inches in diameter, covering an area of over six square inches, or many times greater than that at which the moving picture film is exposed. As the heat rays are thus spread over such a large area of the celluloid screen, the temperature of the screen at no time rises to a dangerous degree, even when exposed to the light continuously, consequently there is no danger of the screen taking fire, and the film is safely protected from the heat. H is a series of colored celluloid screens any one or more of which may be interposed in the projected light between the lamp and the film, for the purpose of protecting the film, and giving any desired color, tint or shade to the picture.

A process for recovering the material of the support of Cinematographic films and waste portions of the same, is the subject of Letters Patent No. 1,065,115 issued to Henry Danzer, of Paris, France. It consists in depriving used, unsold or other films of their gelatin for the purpose of recovering, 1, the metallic silver of the pictures; 2, the material forming the support without occasioning any alteration of the said material. For this purpose preparations containing soluble proteolytic ferments (pepsin, trypsin, papain or the like) or living ferments (liquefying bacteria and the like) are used. For example, the films to be treated, comprising the celluloid bands or supports coated with the insoluble gelatino-bromid emulsion, are plunged into a diluted solution of commercial trypsin, heated to a temperature of about 40 degrees Celsius; in this case, the solution will be effected very rapidly owing to the fact that the trypsin converts the gelatin into peptones which are readily dissolved in cool or tepid water. The solution terminated, the material of the support (in the form of bands) will be washed for the purpose of removing all kinds of impurities and the metallic silver (or in the form of a salt) will be carefully collected.

Registration No. 92,276 has been granted the Societe Anonyme des Celluloses Planchon, of Lyon, France, for "PLAVIK" as a trade-mark for photographic papers, films, plates, photographic apparatus for making negative blocks, enlargers, and parts thereof, dark backs, plateholders, objectives, instantaneous shutters, tripods, photographic printing frames, cameras, apparatus for taking and printing stationary and animated views, spool-films, film-packs, stiff films, stereoscopic films, cinematograph films, photographic draining racks, photographic print and plate washers, photographer's compasses and exposure meters, and photographic lamps. Mark used since October, 1911.



A recently invented machine is designed to clean and render good as new "rainy" films even after sixty days' use. Now let some one evolve means that will automatically eliminate incongruities and render the film innocuous before use. Even in the film consistency is a gem of purest lustre, while "a laugh costs too much when bought at the expense of virtue."

On the English estate of Dr. Francis Ward are several pools teeming with aquatic life, each provided with a subterranean observation chamber. Because of the darkness in the chamber and the light in the pool, the glass front of the chamber acts as a mirror in which the fish merely see themselves and their surroundings reflected, while the observer can plainly see into the pool and take motion pictures or snapshots of water life. It is thus possible to watch and "take" even the most timid of fish without disturbing them. To familiarize the fish with the rattle, a novel contrivance which produces a continuous sound not unlike that of a motion picture machine is used.

Professor Dussard has been turning his attention to the production of a motion picture apparatus for the blind, by means of which they may experience the illusion of moving objects as people with full powers do in viewing an illuminated screen. The device mainly employed for educational purposes consists of a machine operated by electricity which causes a series of reliefs to pass rapidly under the fingers, the reliefs being so graduated that the delicate sense of touch of the blind translates their variations into apparent movements of the objects which are represented.

There are three permanent motion picture theatres in Shanghai, China—the Apollo Theatre, Victoria Music Hall, and the Cinema, Paris. During the summer months, when weather conditions permit of open-air entertainments, temporary stages and curtains are erected in parks and open spaces and motion picture shows set up, which are fairly well patronized.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

Geo. Wm. Miatt

A new member of the Vitagraph Stock Company has already attracted considerable attention in her appearances in Vitagraph life portrayals. Miss Louise Beaudet, who has been for many years prominent on the professional stage, is now proving a competent and unusual artist in moving pictures.

"Things are coming along pretty nicely for "Ramo," says C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager of sales and publicity. This is demonstrated by the fact that C. Lang has discarded his cane and rides about town in his new automobile.

EVERYMAN'S JOURNEY

(Adapted from the Early English Morality Play by Anita Hendrie Miles)

A notable feature film soon to be released is the Kinemacolor production of the morality play of "Everyman." The theme of "Everyman" is that of universal mortality. Every man that lives must some day die. The play begins with a sort of prologue introducing the character of Everyman. Going his way through the beautiful gardens of the earth, Everyman is met by Death, who delivers a message from God, when he has Death least in his mind. He offers Death anything in power to be let off but gets only the privilege of asking certain of his friends if they will go with him upon his journey.

He first accosts Friendship. Friendship has no mind, however, for anything but dicing and drinking. Then to his Kindred, but Kindred sees no reason why he should follow his cousin Everyman on a way so weary. Everyman falters, but Death appears and bids him on. Next he thinks of Riches and exclaims:

"All my life I have loved riches; perhaps he will help me now."

But to his plea, Riches, greedy and of the world, will follow no man in such voyages.

Only Good Deeds will follow Everyman, but alas, as she says:

"Fain would I help thee, but thy Evil Deeds have taken away my strength. Call Knowledge to help thee."

LINDA GRIFFITH AS "EVERYMAN"

And so she sends him to Knowledge, who in turn leads him to Confession. When Confession has shriven Everyman and given him the cloak of sorrow and penitence, Good Deeds is strong again and can walk, and, accompanied by Strength and Beauty, Everyman with Knowledge and Good Deeds sets out on the inevitable path to the tomb. Yet at the brink of the grave Strength and Beauty, too, take flight and abandon him as Fellowship, Kindred and Riches have done. Everyman goes feeble-hearted at the desertion of the false friends, but turns to Good Deeds with a new light.

Good Deeds stands by him even at the grave. Supported and chastened by Good Deeds, Everyman commends his spirit into the Lord's hands, and descends into the grave, for "None excuse may there be for Everyman, for after death amends may no man make."

"Everyman" is a classic in the extreme sense of the term, of anonymous origin, its writer never having been known. It was first published in the fifteenth century, but it has created little attention until some time ago the Elizabethan Stage Society of London revived it. Since that it has been viewed by many hundreds of persons in England and America. That the Kinemacolor production of it excels the stage presentation is obvious on account of the beautiful exterior settings, which render this, without doubt, the most beautiful presentation ever projected upon the screen.

"FLYING A SIDELIGHTS"

The first producer of the "Flying A" company is again back on the staff. The present line of exquisite American photography should make the future productions of Mr. Ricketts stand out with telling effect. Mr. Ricketts came to the American with Jack Kerrigan in the fall of 1910, and his first production was "Romantic Redskins," the scenes of which were taken near St. Joseph, Mich.

* * * *

Before assuming the work of director, Mr. Coxen was seen in parts that created much favorable comment, and "Flying A" fans will be pleased to learn of his return to the work for which he is so eminently suited.

* * * *

It seems that even in the manual labor of handling American's new studio, Jack Kerrigan had to "have a hand in it." "Hurry up with that shovel," called the foreman in charge of a group of laborers hard at work on the water and sewer trenches in the new studio of the "Flying A" at Santa Barbara. Jack Kerrigan straightened up angrily. "Who are you talking to?" he asked hotly. Then, remembering that he was only a common laborer and that the foreman could discharge him instantly, he bent once more to his task. But the harm was done. The foreman strode angrily to his side and ordered him out of the trench. Out of a job, hungry and friendless, he stumbled out of the scene.

Yes, it was a picture—a great two-reel drama entitled "The Scapegoat," under direction of Lorimer Johnston, showing Mr. Kerrigan at his very best, and in which the whole gamut of human emotions is run.

* * * *

During the rehearsing of a scene in "The Mystery of Tusa," a forthcoming American release, Mr. Kerrigan had a narrow escape from death. The producer had in mind a spectacular scene in which Mr. Kerrigan, U. S. Secret Service operative, is captured by bandits, bound hand and foot, and tied to a wild horse. The horse selected for the scene was the most restive in the stables of the American Company. He became startled and started to run, with the result that Mr. Kerrigan was jerked down an embankment, where the rope entangled around a tree and broke. But for this Mr. Kerrigan might have sustained fatal injuries. Jack says "Never again!"

TWO MORE VICTORIES FOR THE RELIANCE BALL TEAM

Saturday at Lenox Oval the Reliance players defeated Solax by a score of 12 to 1, and followed up that victory by another on the Eclair home grounds in Jersey City, Sunday afternoon, with a score of 10 to 4.

Sam Smith, of the Reliance team, carried off the honors in both games by his clever work at the bat. In the Reliance-Solax game he succeeded in placing a long three-base drive over the center fielder's head during the fifth inning with the bases full, starting a stampede over homeplate which continued until the last curtain.

In the Eclair-Reliance game he sent his batting average skyward, by two home runs, two triples and a double.

On the Fourth of July Reliance plays Atlantic Highlands at the Highlands, and on Saturday, July 5th, meets the Lubin Champions in Philadelphia.

Unusual interest is centered in the Lubin-Reliance game and both studios will attend in a body to support their respective teams.

FREDERICK SULLIVAN

Mr. Frederick Sullivan, whose picture is displayed this week, is one of the several dramatic directors who have left the stage and its art to take up seriously the producing of pictures. The fact that Mr. Sullivan has over fifteen years of high-class dramatic experience behind him makes his value as a real dramatic director obvious to anyone who is looking for the proper theatrical values of any story to be brought out.

Mr. Sullivan was born in England, and is a nephew of the celebrated composer, Sir Arthur Sullivan, whose "Mikado," "Pinafore" and other works are household words both here and in England. He came to this country at an early age, and after serving in the newspaper business for six years entered the dramatic profession, at once studying to become a director. For fifteen years he has been connected with the most important stock companies in America, having directed the performances of such stars as Blanche Bates, Blanche Walsh, John Mason, Rose Coghlan, Herbert Kelcey, Effie Shannon, and others of the same standing in the theatrical profession. Very few young men in the business have had the wide experience and high connections that Mr. Sullivan has enjoyed throughout his professional career.

Mr. Sullivan has just closed his engagement with the Reliance Company, Mr. J. V. Ritchey releasing him so that Mr. Sullivan might accept the post of feature director to the International Film Company. His first picture will be a three-reel costume drama in which the well-known Shakespearian actor, Frederick Warde, will be the star.

In addition to his regular work, Mr. Sullivan is opening an office in the Shubert Building for the handling and manufacturing of a certain class of political picture making. He will have as his associate in this matter Mr. John L. Folsom, a well-known business man of this city.

EDISON NOTES

Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott write that they are having the time of their lives. A week spent on the beautiful Thames gave Marc ample time in which to recover from that awful trip over, but he swears that he will never forget it. He is now busy trying to organize a British company to build a subway from London to New York so that he can return without repeating the same harrowing experiences.

With characteristic enterprise the Edison people secured the exclusive right to photograph the great international polo match, and they are releasing a wonderful thousand foot reel on June 30th, showing the many brilliant plays that will cause the 1913 match to stand for years as the greatest in polo history.

Frank McGlynn, fresh from his tremendous success in the Chicago production of "Officer 666," has joined the Edison players, with whom he won wide popularity a year or so ago. Possessed of a virile personality, he has the faculty of "getting over" very forcibly on the screen, and from now on will be seen in a wide range of characters. His ability as an actor, coupled with his knowledge of the requirements of work before the camera, makes him a particularly valued member of the already splendid array of Edison players. Another important acquisition to the Edison ranks is Dan Mason, famous as the character comedian in "The Man from Mexico," "Why Smith Left Home," "The Prince of Pilsen," and numerous vaudeville successes, who has already scored a big hit as Professor William Nutt in the film of that name.

William West has returned from his trip to Georgia as a member of Charles M. Seay's company. Mr. West reports a most enjoyable time with a slight exception of the loss of his pocketbook in the Atlanta station. He was descending the stairs to the train platform at the time and distinctly felt someone pushing him, but thought it was Herbert Prior urging him on. Prior, however, had been separated from him in the crowd, as he discovered too late.

We hate to spring this, as it sounds suspicious, but it is a matter of record that at the time of the theft he was playing the part of a man who was robbed of his ticket and money on a train and had been forced to get off at Atlanta. Mr. West did not care to say how much the wallet contained, but it is understood that he sustained a considerable loss.

Charles M. Seay is patting himself on the back as one of our best diplomatists. And why shouldn't he? It isn't every director who could persuade the governor of Georgia and the mayor of Atlanta to let go the helm of public affairs to pose in moving pictures. But Mr. Seay has the gift of persuasion which turned the trick and both of these celebrities consented to appear in the Edison film, "Scenes of Other Days."

Herbert Prior, who appeared with both of the celebrities, when asked how they impressed him as pictureplayers, said that he believed politics really held out a more promising field of endeavor for them both, though he was surprised at their self-possession. However, though he could not recommend the executives for stock company purposes, he was warm in their praises in all other respects. In fact, both he and Mabel Trunnelle united in their expressions of delight at the old fashioned Southern hospitality which was extended to them on every hand during their stay.

Although the Selig Polyscope Company has the largest skylight of any structure in Chicago, the intense heat of the first few days of last week was not as perceptible as might have been anticipated by reason of the fine new cooling plant that has been installed in the building, supplying iced air to the big studio.

* * * *

William Farnum and his brother, Marshal Farnum, stalwart favorite actors associated with many dramatic successes, have been now engaged by the Selig Polyscope Company for some special productions that will be made at the big Selig plant in Los Angeles, Cal. They will begin work there on the 8th of July in a new pictorial version of Vincent Churchill's most famous American novel, "The Crisis."

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

It being more or less apparent that the makers of film are drifting away from the sensational film story, which is commendable, making dramatic effects of less value, it becomes necessary that we give more attention to the better music, which is positively essential to the quiet, educational non-sensational picture.

Music will be a prominent factor in pictures of this kind and it will not be ragtime. Of forty releases seen in one week there were but five that contained any violent action of any account, and none in which the action was spread throughout the entire film.

To the student this will be a godsend, for when the picture contains no rhythmic suggestions, and the story proper is continually interrupted by some ridiculous gun-play or other impossible violent action which does little more than excite children, advanced musical capabilities could be of little value in picture playing. It should be gratifying to the musician to note that every advance in the production of pictures is a step toward the ultimate combination of the picture and music. It is deplorable to note how many pictures offering opportunities for better acting are gotten away with in the old style of posing, but there is no doubt that this will soon wear off and the directors will see the error of their ways. It is a fact that when you see a picture done by a cast that is known to adhere to the art of acting you always find something enjoyable in it, regardless of the subject matter or story. Setting music to pictures made by a capable cast is a natural consequence, while those lacking inspiration are nearly impossible.

To accompany the non-violent picture without making your music tiresome, it is necessary that you classify your repertoire, beginning at a central point, determining the different degrees of temperament until you arrive at the two extremes, plaintive and hilarious.

To determine these different degrees of temperament is entirely a matter of personal inspiration. It was my good fortune about fifteen years ago to have in my orchestra two Leipsig graduates who had cultivated a jocular habit of classing every number that they played, giving a humorous anecdote as to the composer's probable inspiration. While at that time it was the students' diversion and considered humor, to-day in picture playing these jokes become a study, which if taken up properly are of greater scope and value than the study of harmony, while not so difficult to master. The more important in setting music to the non-violent picture is the avoiding of a tiresome sameness in your numbers, which can only be done after you are familiar with the temperamental value of the numbers you play. While it would be difficult, still this could be done and all numbers used for the entire picture might be in ¾ or 4/4. All worthy pictures concentrate at certain points on the prime thought or moral the producer wishes to convey and if the music is to assist, tension numbers must be properly placed at such points.

To make such high tension numbers effective they must be surrounded by other lighter numbers, thereby allowing your feature numbers to stand out prominently.

Neutral numbers are possibly the more difficult to determine upon.

In testing your numbers you will find it a good rule to classify all numbers as neutral which do not impress you sympathetically or stand out as being frivolous or boisterous in temperament.

While at first thought such numbers may be considered valueless, yet it is such numbers that give the proper weight to your feature numbers used. They are to the musical setup pictures what the enharmonic is to the advanced musical composition.

It should be remembered to avoid the use of all numbers that are not strictly melodious unless they are of temperamental value.

It might be well for the exhibitor who has an orchestra of some size installed to inform himself of the real value of the educational picture, which I class as neutral, in selecting his programs. It has come to my notice in houses where picture music efforts are made that this picture is often passed by on account of not suggesting musical rhythm. In reality this is the picture's value to the setting of a musical program. If an orchestra is to be properly appreciated by the audience, it must feature itself as well as the picture. The genuine educational picture gives the musician any opportunity he may desire for the rendition of classics or large standard compositions, knowing that there is no possible picture rhythm to disturb the temperament of the most critical in the audience. From personal experience I can vouch for it that in such pictures you can get your heavy numbers over and have them appreciated.

Of such pictures there are none made to as great an advantage as the usual Tuesday's and Friday's release of the Pathe Freres Company.

These pictures are educational to the very letter of the word, and I have always found them appreciated. The addition of good music makes them doubly so. The educational releases of other companies, while interesting from a picture point of view, do not offer the same musical opportunities, as their subjects seldom run over a few hundred feet, during which time it is hardly possible to render any musical composition of consequence. The time is here when the average and more intelligent of the masses are finding their amusement in the picture theatre, and probably form the greatest percentage of the present patronage. These patrons will not only appreciate such pictures, but the better music as well. You will also find that when it is necessary to add a scenic to complete a Pathe neutral release it always is a genuine scenic, depending upon its exceptionally good photography and coloring to gain its merit. The time ought soon arrive when each and every picture program will have at least one such subject. May the Pathe Freres prosper in their earnest endeavors and continue to be as was recently mentioned to me by a man greatly interested in the "Picture Theatre," viz., to the picture industry what David Belasco is to the stage.

ANSWERS TO INQUIRIES

W. G. W. Summit, N. J. You can see me at the Broadway Theatre any day between 5 and 7 P. M. by appointment.

F. E. R. Newark, Ohio. Received your letter very late and have passed your check to the proper party. The articles will appear as before. It is some time since I have seen the pictures for which you send me plots, and I would not be able to criticise them, certain conditions making my time too valuable to refer to old notes. I was pleased to see that you had followed some of my previous suggestions and I hope you found it beneficial.

OPERATORS' CHAT

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—J. A. LeRoy.

Office—133 Third Avenue.

Owing to a misunderstanding it was announced in last week's Chat that a meeting would take place on June 30. This was not correct. The next meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will take place on Monday, July 7, 1913, at 12 p. m., at 66 Essex street.

The remarkable number of applicants for membership has compelled the Examining Board to meet four days this week and they surely have had a busy time of it at every session, as the coming meeting will witness the largest number of applicants gathered together at any meeting for obligation. It seems that the operators who are not members of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 should take advantage of the next few days as July 31, 1913, is positively the last day that they will be able to enroll under the present fee of $5, for believe me, it will cost you $50 on and after August 1, 1913, so if you want to save or make $45 do it now and join the only operators' union in New York City.

On Tuesday, July 1, 1913, our worthy president, Robt Goldblatt, started on the 12 o'clock train for the convention at Seattle, Wash., carrying with him the best wishes and Godspeed from all members of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, and from all previous indications the five years' fight for justice will at last be realized in a manner entirely satisfactory to all concerned.

In a recent issue of a trade paper a notice appeared that "Dick De Costa had been vindicated." Now, just a line on this so-called vindication. No member of this organization that has made the charges against De Costa was ever called to appear before any one person or body of men when this so-called vindication took place, and further, the members of the I. B. E. W. disclaim any knowledge of such vindication, and they (the I. B. E. W.) are vitally interested in the matter and have never been notified of any investigation. Some vindication this without the complainant appearing. Same thing in politics is called "whitewashing."

Now to go back to last week's issue of the Chat, wherein the writer mentioned the eye troubles of the operator. The consensus of opinion seems to be that the ultraviolet rays which emanate from the arc light cause weakening of the eye nerves. These same rays are of the invisible kind and also include X, N and Y rays. Now by experiment with the arc light the ultraviolet rays, and using a photographer's plateholder in which a sensitive photo plate was placed and entirely shutting the plate from ordinary light, some metal objects were placed on the slide of the plateholder and exposed to the arc light for twenty minutes. At the end of this time the plate was developed and the result showed conclusively the penetrating power of the ultraviolet rays, for on the photo plate, after developing the shadow, images were distinctly visible. This shows the penetration of these invisible rays. The ultraviolet rays are not entirely stopped by the thin metal used in the moving picture machine lamp house, therefore the operator is always under bombardment of the rays, which affect the eyes principally. They do not seem to have any detrimental effect upon any other portion of the human body. One communication the writer has received clearly presents the only harmless remedy, and quite a number of the members of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 have already secured glass of the kind described through the writer of the Chat and are greatly benefited.

Mr. J. A. LeRoy,
New York City.

Dear Sir:—

Replying to yours of the 22nd, we have articles on this subject that appear from time to time, but at present have not copies on hand as issues are all exhausted. However, we can give you a little information.

There is a glass made of a slightly greenish yellow tint, known in the trade by several names, but the original name being Euphos. Also there is another variety known as Hallauer glass. These glasses come in very light tints so that they do not interfere with clear vision. We think that if operators will wear glasses made of this particular glass, which can be had of any first-class optician, that all inflammatory troubles will disappear. If the person does not wear glasses, then he could use planos, or another way is to have a little screen made of this glass, placed between his eyes and the light. We suppose that a piece six by nine inches will probably be sufficient. We think that if you inquire of various optical houses that you can get fitted out at a reasonable price. Both of these glasses cut off completely, or almost completely, all the ultraviolet light.

Very sincerely yours,
R. M. Lockwood,
Technical Editor.

If any reader is interested and wishes to secure these glasses the regular price is $5 for plain glasses and $8 to $10 for lenses ground to order on a prescription from an oculist, but an arrangement has been made with a prominent oculist of twenty-five years experience to furnish the glasses for $3 plain and $3 to $5 ground to your order. In the next issue of the Chat further information will be given.

HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW'S VISIT (July 9).—Mrs. Brandon is such a prim, particular person that you would never believe she had been so unconventional as to give up school teaching to get married. She is one of those very unwise people who think that it is unnecessary to be attractive and charming after the honeymoon.

It is a delightful thing to see a young wife taking an interest in her home, but Mrs. Brandon rather overdoes it. She takes so much interest in her home that she forgets to take enough interest in her husband.

When Brandon comes into the house wearing his wet rubbers, Mrs. Brandon scolds him, not because she is anxious about his health, but because she doesn't want her carpets to be spoiled. When he lights a cigar, it is her curtains rather than his throat that she is worried about, and she will not let him play ragtime music because it gives her a headache and not on account of any consideration for his aesthetic welfare.

Brandon is a good-natured, easy-going chap, but his wife's exactions gradually wear on his disposition. He falls into the habit of going to the club in the evening with his friend Bill.

Mrs. Brandon, unable to appreciate her husband's dissatisfaction with his home, is deeply aggrieved and sends for her mother. Owing to their sudden marriage, Brandon has never met his mother-in-law, and her prospective arrival seems to him to be the last straw.

However, Mrs. Nowall is not at all like the characteristic mother-in-law of contemporary fiction. She is a charming woman with a great deal of experience and tact. Discovering immediately the source of the discord in the Brandon household, she gives her daughter good advice, with the result that the husband is surprised to find a tashionably dressed young woman awaiting his return from business, in place of the severe-looking person he is accustomed to expect. Instead of being treated coldly, Bill is greeted with enthusiasm and asked to stay to dinner, and afterwards Mrs. Brandon lights the men's cigarettes with her own hands. And Brandon no longer wants to go to the club.

KINEMACOLOR

PEARLS OF THE MADONNA.—This is a stirring story of the early days of California when the missions flourished, and yearly pilgrimages were made by the sick to the shrine of the Madonna to be healed.

A pilgrimage is on its way across the desert. Among those going to the shrine are Jaquita, a young girl, and a rich woman, who is crippled and who has vowed to give the wonderful pearls about her neck to the Madonna, should she be healed. Jaquita covets these pearls. At the shrine the miracle takes place, and the lame woman walks. The pearls are hung about the neck of the statue. Jaquita tries to steal them but is not successful.

At home the girl thinks of nothing but the pearls and vows to marry the man who gets them for her. Horrified, all but one of her lovers leave her. Jose, however, struggles with his love for the girl and his religion. Love conquers, and he starts across the desert to the shrine. He gets the pearls. Later the theft is discovered, and the guilty pair are stoned out into the desert.

Out on the desert the desperate pair determine to commit suicide, but in the sky a vision of the Madonna appears, they kneel in prayer and journey to the shrine, replacing the pearls on the neck of the statue. So they repent. Jaquita as a nun praying at the shrine, and Jose as a monk working in the gardens of the cloister make a very beautiful finish to a notable picture.

MIXED SIGNALS.—A quaint comedy of the sea, fairly filled with sunshine and sea breezes.

Old Captain Bill bids his sailors good-bye to spend his old age in a little cottage on the shore. With him go his daughter, Matey, and an old seafaring friend called Bunty. Soon the Captain tires of the land and buys a sailboat, engaging the former owner as "crew." Of course the "crew"and the daughter fall in love, but the old man does not see it.

Among the Captain's treasures in his trunk is a set of the International Signal Code flags, which he tries to teach to Jack. Especially does he try to impress two very important flags which, if flown together, mean "Am attacked, need help," but Jack is too deep in lovemaking to heed. The young people elope and return to confess, but the old man orders them both out.

Jack gets a position as a lighthouse keeper, and there takes his bride. On opening her trunks Matey finds she has the signal flags instead of clothes.

Months pass, the old Captain grows more and more lonely, but is too stubborn to give in.

In the lighthouse joy reigns. Happy Jack writes a letter to his mother, saying, "Watch the signals; one a girl, two a boy." Soon Jack rushes to the trunk, grabs two flags without looking, and hoists them. The old Captain sees these signals, and blows the bugle for help. All the village responds, and with all sorts and conditions of weapons, the fisher folk pile into boats and start to the rescue. All rush into the lighthouse demanding to meet the enemy. Jack motions for silence, leaves the room, placing the "enemy" in the grandfather's arms. The old man's heart is touched, and when he is led into the other room and sees his little Matey, all is forgiven.

RELIANCE

A RURAL ROMANCE (July 7).—Nancy Hall, the village belle and Jack Fisher, a farm hand, are sweethearts. Ernest Ashe, Jack's employer, a wealthy grower, chances upon them and is taken with Nancy's beauty. Ashe pays court secretly to Nancy, until Jack, stumbling upon them, learns the truth. They quarrel, and Jack is discharged. Infuriated, Ashe continues his work of collecting rents. Old Tom Moore is in arrears in rent and trembles at his approach. Spying his tenant's horse, Ashe insists upon its surrender for debt. Moore has to submit, and tries in vain to subdue his grandson, Teddy, who is heartbroken at the loss. Next day Jack goes to collect his wages from Ashe. Directed by his fellow workers, he meets Ashe coming out on Beauty, Moore's horse. They settle their account. Two bright eyes are watching them for Teddy is trying to enter the stable. Looking after Jack in vile temper, Ashe returns to the road, where Beauty has wandered to the field to graze. This provokes him to brutality. As Teddy sees him lash his pet he is seized with blind fury and, picking up a rock, he hurls it at Ashe, who falls. Horrified at his act, Teddy dashes across the fields and to the railroad crossing, where he crawls inside a freight car, crying himself to sleep. Five minutes after directing Jack to Ashe, the farm hands find Ashe unconscious. Jack is suspected. Meanwhile Jack meets Nancy and is reproaching her when he is interrupted by the law for the murder of Ashe. Protesting inocence, he is dragged to jail, while Nancy flies to the Ashe home. Ashe regains consciousness and sees Nancy enter his chamber. Fearing death and believing her the cause, he denounces her, the crushed, shrinking plaything of the day. Nancy is turned out of doors. She realizes her folly. Teddy, in the meantime, is carried off in a westbound train. He is found and cared for by trainmen, who finally return him to his home, where he is snatched to his grandad's breast and sobs out his tale. Nancy happens in to console the old man, hears also, and, grabbing Teddy, dashes off to the jail, where all may learn of Jack's innocence. Nancy then turns away sorrowfully, but is followed by Jack, and all is forgiven.

ASHES (Two Reels) (July 12).—An old man, alone in his mansion, decides to give a dinner to the memories of the girls he loved and lost. He has the table decked with garlands and at each place he puts a bouquet of the flowers most representative of the girl who would occupy that place if she herself were there instead of his memory of her.

There is a bunch of violets at the first plate. As he stoops over the fragrant blossoms, he lives again the first romance of his life when he met and fell in love with pretty Betty, a country lass. This was in the first days of his youth, and her refusal of him almost broke his heart. Seeing her in the arms of his more fortunate rival, he left the village, and there the memory of the violets ends. There is a bunch of lilies of the valley at the next plate. They bring back a girl just as white and cold as the flower. She was a society belle, and he met her when he first visited the big city. She said she loved him, and he believed her. But when a richer man proposed, she cast him aside for wealth. Her wedding was the talk of the town, but the boy did not wait for it. He never saw her again. Orchids at the next plate, their purple depths held sweet memories of a bewitching face, the face of the lovely Countess, whose most ardent admirer he was when he first went up to Washington, a young attache in the diplomatic service. She pretended that she loved him and he was very happy. But into the midst of his joy came the shock of discovering that his sweet Countess was a foreign spy, who intended to use him to gain information she could not get any other way. He left Washington at once to forget her. Red roses! What memories their perfume held! That night in Paris when he first met the dark-eyed Spanish dancer Carmencita. How he loved her, and how she loved him until her lover, the Count, challenged him to a duel on her account. Then Carmencita realizes that it was not the American to whom her heart was given, after all. She rushed to the duelling ground to prevent bloodshed, but wholly for the Count's sake.

Returning to America, an older, wiser man, he finds his ideal in the charming daughter of some old friends. Realizing that he is very rich, this girl's parents insist upon her accepting him. But he discovers in time that her heart is given to his secretary, and for her sake he gives her up. The sweet peas at this last plate are, perhaps, the dearest flowers of all to him.

As he rises to toast these ladies of his past the stem of his wine glass snaps and he falls across the table, dead. An overturned candle sets fire to the draperies and before many minutes each flower is reduced to a small heap of ashes.

UNMASKED.—Malevolently seeking to ruin Albert Rossi, favored suitor of Beatrix, daughter of James Remonti, proprietor of an iron foundry in which Rossi and James Fluery are executives, Fluery surreptitiously photographs plans of inventions made by Remonti and which plans were in the care of Rossi. When a rival company advertises these patents as their own, Remonti accuses Rossi.

Rossi obtains a clerkship with the competing company. He discovers the photograph of Remonti's plans and an anonymous letter in a handwriting sinisterly familiar.

Taking the incriminating papers, Rossi hastens to Remonti's home. He learns that Beatrix by force of parental will has agreed to be married to Fluery who has risen in Remonti's employ, esteem and confidence. The nuptial party is then on its way to a far away city wherein dwells Fluery's wealthy uncle.

Rossi misses train connections. To save time, he starts afoot across the passes in the precipitous Alps. Customs officials, suspicious because of his taking an almost suicidal route, arrest him. Desperate at the delay, Rossi coaxes a guard into allowing him to join in their play in the deep snow. He burrows into a huge snowball and curled within it, rolls down the steep incline at express speed. The ball rolls into a creek and is dissolved.

Hotly pursued, Rossi grasps a pulley running over a wire used to transport lumber over the valleys from peak to peak. He launches forth at lightning speed, clinging with fearful hold to the pulley handle. Should his grip loosen—death!

At the eleventh hour when the guests are about to witness the marriage ceremonials, Rossi dashes in, establishes the guilt of the bridegroom-elect and his own innocence. Rossi then comes into his own.

WINNING A PRIZE (July 5).—Bertie and Flo are deeply in love with each other, but their admiration for each other is so sincere that it amounts to jealousy at times. They enter a restaurant and a quarrel ensues after Bertie has lifted his hat in salutation to two young women of his acquaintance. At this juncture a vender of lottery tickets appears upon the scene and Bertie buys a double coupon, each side bearing the same number. During their quarrel the ticket is divided, Bertie taking his half and Flo hers. They separate "never to meet again" and go on their ways, but not rejoicing. Neither will give in, but several days later a startling denouement comes when they both learn that their ticket has won a prize. It is not a money lottery, but one of those commercial affairs in which articles of household furniture are presented to the winners. Bertie and Flo hasten to the lottery office. By chance they are given seats together, but give no sign of recognition. Each claims the prize and each presents half the winning ticket. There is a whispered conversation among the lottery managers and considerable delay before the truth is made known. The prize is a baby's perambulator and according to the rules of the lottery concern the prize cannot be divided. Then follows a number of humorous scenes in which Bertie is made to push the perambulator to his lodgings. Of course, the humorous side of the lottery incident is the means of bringing about a reconciliation.

OLD DOC YAK (July 8).—Introducing in unique animated cartoons, the famous comic supplement character "Old Doc Yak," drawn by his creator, Sidney Smith, through courtesy of the Chicago Tribune. Sidney Smith, the artist, incurs the displeasure of the Sunday Editor by his oft-repeated failure to report at the art room on time. A moving picture producer one morning applies for and obtains permission from the newspaper to reproduce in animated form their comic supplement character, "Old Doc Yak." The producer's requirements call for one thousand separate, carefully prepared original drawings from the pen of Artist Smith before noon of that day. The Sunday Editor rushes to the art room, but Smith has not shown up that morning. Along about noon the artist comes sauntering in very leisurely. The Sunday Editor, peeved at Smith's seeming indifference to newspaper office discipline, tells him of the work before him and that one thousand drawings must absolutely be finished inside of an hour. Smith offers to bet $50 that he can accomplish the task. The Editor bets him that he can't and the stakes are placed in the hands of another artist. Then we see a close-up view of Smith's hand as it rapidly draws and inks in a face of the ever laughable goat. This face then comes to life and its contortions are wonderfully amusing. Next he draws a scene showing "Doc" standing in a room looking intently at a bee. The drawing suddenly comes to life and the antics of the pair are truly funny. Another scene shows an enlarged view of "Doc's" face after it has been stung by the bee. This and many other amusing and novel scenes are climaxed by the unique illusion which is secured in the finis piece. Needless to say, Smith wins his bet and the art room takes a vacation for the afternoon while the money is spent.

On the same reel.

A JOLT FOR THE JANITOR.—A comical story of the Flannigan Flats, showing how the janitor got the worst of it when, through his carelessness, water came in through the roof and leaked from one flat to another.

ESSANAY

THE SIGN (July 11).—Pietro, an Italian laborer, refuses the company of his fellow workmen, to return to his home immediately with his pay envelope. On the way he passes the Guiseppe bank, and is accosted by Lorenzo, the banker, to deposit his money with him, so that some day Pietro might be able to return to sunny Italy. Pietro arrives at his home, tells his wife about the banker, and she consents to his depositing their savings. Some time later, Pietro, having saved six hundred and seventy-five dollars, calls at the bank, only to discover that there is a run on same. The now almost maddened Italian calls at the home of the banker, and finding that gentleman out, sits at his desk and writes a note, asking for the return of his money. Pietro accidentally turns over the ink-well. In his excitement, Pietro wipes his ink-blacked hands on the curtains, the blotter on the desk, and on some stationery. Lorenzo returns, and thinking that the black hand is after him, returns the money to the Italian and to the rest of the depositors of his bank.

PATHE

THE AIRMAN'S BRIDE (July 8).—The first quarrel between Hans Anderson and his beautiful daughter, Frieda, occurred when the girl refused to marry Anderson's business partner, Karl Muller, preferring to be the bride of a young aviator, Paul Hallet. Frieda leaves her father's roof and goes to live in a lighthouse tended by Oscar Jurgens, the husband of Anderson's elderly housekeeper. While waiting for her father to relent Frieda sends the lighthouse keeper with a note to her lover. During Oscar's absence a fire breaks out in the tower. From the shore Hallet and the old man see the girl on the balcony of the tower in a circle of flame. Quickness is necessary. Hallet hurries to his hangar and in a few moments is sailing in his aeroplane toward the lighthouse. He drops a rope from his machine. Frieda seizes the rope as it passes her and after a wild ride finds herself safe and sound in Hallet's arms. When Anderson learns the news he informs his partner that he has changed his mind.

THE SCHOOL MA'AM (July 9).—Her husband's failing health and lack of money compel Mrs. Helen Walls to seek work. She secures a position as a school teacher at Silver Lake but to do so is forced to pose as an unmarried woman, the regulations of the school board requiring that the teachers must be single. Her husband's presence places Mrs. Walls in an embarassing position, but while the school board is investigating a fire in the school gives Walls an opportunity to display his courage. Even though he is in poor health Walls proves himself so much of a man that by unanimous consent of the school board Mrs. Walls is allowed to continue in her position and her husband given such work as will help him out of his difficulty.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 10).

HANNIGAN'S HAREM (July 10).—Everyone knows that it takes only one drink too many to make your head spin. Poor Hannigan was all right if he had not taken the last drink, but he did, and immediately he imagined himself the honored guest of the Sultan who gave him unrestrained authority and the key to the Harem. You can imagine what happened to Hannigan! Scenicly this is the most beautiful film released this year and no doubt exhibitors realize the opportunities the story offers for laughs. These chances have been utilized in a manner that will make this release the biggest comedy hit we ever issued, and that's going some!

PORCELAIN (July 11).—The millions of persons that seem to have not the slightest idea of the method of manufacturing the simple things in everyday use will be greatly enlightened and delighted with this film, which shows in all its stages the making and moulding of porcelain dishes, plates, pitchers, etc. The skill displayed by the workmen employed in this industry has an odd fascination, but even greater is the skill of the finishing artists, who complete the sculpturing work on various beautiful statuettes. An educational picture that has the advantage of enabling its audience to watch the creation of a work of art.

DYNAMITE, THE NEW FARM HAND (July 12).—The lack of laborers on farms throughout the United States has brought to prominent notice the use of dynamite as a substitute for farm hands. In this film the marvellous effectiveness of dynamite is shown in various views such as blasting of a drainage ditch, removing a dead tree, blasting four tree stumps at one operation, breaking up a boulder and the more delicate work of breaking soil with dynamite for planting fruit trees. The film has a message to farmers and will interest many people who are anxious to keep pace with the times.

THE CARPENTER (July 10).—It is a source of great grief to Alkanah Dyzer that his son Rupert has joined the rebel army. He drives him from the house, telling him that he never wishes to see him again. Rupert's brothers are also furious with him and will likewise have nothing to do with him.

George Dyzer, who has joined the Northern army, loses his arm in a battle and is made prisoner by the rebels. While in the hospital he makes the acquaintance of the "stranger in gray," a man greatly beloved by the soldiers. The stranger takes him to his brother Rupert and by his strange influence causes the hate between the two men to vanish.

The "Stranger in Gray" arrives at Alkanah Dyzer's house just as he has heard the news of the loss of his whole fortune. He is cordially welcomed and offered the best hospitality. While in the house the Stranger prevents a growing rift between John Dyzer and his wife Emily, who is almost on the point of elopement with Harry Faulkner, a visitor to the house. By reminding them of their dead child and their duty to their remaining little one, Lillie, he causes husband and wife to realize their real love for one another.

The Stranger calls Mr. Dyzer and his family into the parlor where he bids him take down his father's portrait, reputed to be very valuable. Taking off the back, the Stranger shows them that between the painting and the backing had been hidden a fortune in bills, put there by his father. This treasure is enough to re-establish Dyzer's fortunes.

To complete their happiness the Stranger stays on for the birthday party that is being given that evening. Leaving the house for a few moments he returns bringing with him the two soldier boys, George and Rupert, whom he presents to their father and mother.

The work of the Stranger being completed he bids all farewell and passes out into the night. As he blesses them on his departure, they are brought to think of the Carpenter of Nazareth and of the lovingkindness that watches over us all.

THE FLEA CIRCUS (July 9).—The professor, after many years of hard work, has succeeded in training a number of fleas, and some of them have become very intelligent, one in particular. One day, when taking this flea out for an airing, it escapes, and the professor is much disturbed. He follows it on hands and knees to his apartment, but is not quite as nimble as his pet, which gets into the next apartment and proceeds to make enemies with an old gentleman with a bald head. This old gentleman, by a dexterous movement of his hand and fingers, catches the pet, and is about to throw it into the fire, when the professor appears and explains to him what a terrible crime he is about to commit. He saves his pet and takes the old gentleman and says that he will show him a few things he did not know about fleas. We next see the professor in his laboratory with his wonderful microscope, and then we see through the microscope the marvelous performances of the flea in question and his brothers. They walk a tight rope, they pull guns and round-abouts, they work a treadmill, they jump through hoops, and do many other novel things. The method of feeding them is shown, and the method of placing the chain around their necks. It is by means of this chain composed of a wire one two-thouandth (1-2000) of an inch in diameter that the flea is trained. This subject is a remarkable offering from a scientific point of view, and further, is full of fun.

AS THE BELL RINGS (July 11).—John and Phil Burton are brothers. John is a young minister and Phil a young heartbreaker. Phil plays with the affections of all the girls in their town, and one in particular, Mary, who loves him. John is angry with his brother for his soulless conduct, and on leaving for another city, where he has been nominated, he makes his brother promise to marry Mary. This Phil promises after some remonstrance. When John has departed, however, Phil forgets his promises and instead of marrying Mary, goes through a mock ceremony with her, helped innocently by a college chum.

Five years later we see John in his new home. Mary comes along the village road with her child, weary and sad, seeking John. She has been deserted by Phil. John receives her and promises that his brother shall right the wrong done to her and sets the detectives to find Phil. In the meantime the village gossips are busy and decide that the conduct of John in receiving a young woman and child in his parsonage is shameful and that such immorality should not be allowed. They therefore request John to vacate the parsonage. John finally succeeds in finding Phil and in a very dramatic scene forces a return of Phil's manhood and succeeds in this way in arranging a marriage between Phil and Mary. John himself marries them in his little church, and as the gossips arrive to insist on his immediate departure, they are greeted at the door of the church by John, who introduces them to his brother, his wife and child.

GAUMONT

HIS MASTER'S VOICE (July 8).—Joseph is an ideal valet, but objects to his employer's stay-at-home proclivities. Poor Joseph has no time to himself at all, and samples the contents of the wine-cellar at imminent risk of discovery. An invitation from a long forgotten aunt, who returns from abroad with a charming niece, looks suspicious. Joseph has sacrificed ambition and accepted the prospect of a quiet life, he desires no rise in the world, still less does he contemplate marriage. An inspiration seizes him; he wants his employer to fall victim to a fair enchantress; he will accept the invitation but will go made up as Mr. O'Malley. In the long ago Joseph had starred on the "ten-twenty-thirty time," and it takes him but a few moments to apply grease-paint and moustache. He plays his part to perfection, the luncheon is a great success, and Suzanne is desperately smitten. So far, so good. The next invitation following quickly upon the first, is permitted to fall into O'Malley's hands, and although he is at loss to understand it, the employer decides to investigate the extraordinary damsel who has seemingly become enamoured of him. Joseph's disguise leads to Mr. O'Malley's cordial reception, but his formal manner causes some embarrassment until Suzanne decides that it needs the conservatory to make things run smoothly with this very backward suitor. Suzanne's charm soon sets O'Malley at his ease and ere long he entirely succumbs to her fascination. Returning home in a puzzled frame of mind he seeks explanation of the mystery from Joseph, who for answer goes out of the room, returning a moment later in his disguise, asking the pertinent question: "Do you recognize yourself, sir?" The astonished employer easily perceives that Joseph has prepared the way for his conquest, but having found such a sweet companion in Suzanne, he finds it easy to forgive his deception.

THE MAKING OF TAPESTRY (July 8).—This series of pictures was taken in one of the largest establishments at Tours, the great textile centre of France, and gives an interesting description of the processes employed in present-day manufacture of tapestry. The design to be embroidered is first planned on paper and afterwards reproduced on a material by perforation. The subject is then cut out and stuck on a carpet or other foundation, and the design embroidered by machinery. The making of the tasselled fringe, which is sewn around carpets, is also illustrated, and the film ends showing the great shuttle machines at work.

THE WAYWARD SON (July 12).—Ed Ryan is the spirited son of John Ryan. He was brought up on a Western ranch and, through association with reckless cowboys, drinks often and heavily. His father is stern and has little sympathy for his wayward son. The mother's love finds excuses for her boy many times. At last the crisis comes and Ed is driven out by the father while the weeping mother and sister protest, but to no avail. Time passes and Ed writes home to his mother. The father, fearing a scene, keeps the letter from her. After waiting for months for a reply, Ed becomes dejected. He decides to leave the country and goes to the post office for the last time to ask for news from home. The mail bag is on the counter and Ed overhears the postmaster tell the R. F. D. man to be very careful of a registered package, as it contains the pay roll of the Two Bar Ranch. In his embittered state of mind, Ed becomes imbued with the spirit of a desperado. He decides to hold up the mail man and secure the money. He does so. Ed's father, in the meantime, has died and his mother finds her son's letter in the dead man's clothes. She writes at once, but too late to save her boy. The first letter he tears open contains a picture of his mother and sister and the long looked for letter from home.

He is overcome and for the first time realizes the enormity of his act. He decides to atone as best as he can, and hurries to the town and confesses all to the postmaster. In the meantime, the sheriff and posse are on his trail. They return, and Ed is made prisoner, the sheriff promising to be as lenient as possible. Ed asks the postmaster one favor. It is that his mother and sister shall never know. The postmaster marks the letter "Opened by mistake." "Letter unclaimed." "Return to sender." Ed goes to prison while the mother and sister wait and hope in vain for his return.

AT THE HALF-BREED'S MERCY (July 19).—Temptation has always been disguised in the most pleasing settings just as the bitterest pills often have the sweetest sugar coating.

When Ed leaves home, to deposit his employer's money in the town bank, he takes affectionate leave from his wife and little dreams of the pitfalls that confront him before the day is over. How he would become dishonest, disloyal, brutal and a coward before he would again see the sweet countenance that radiated inspiration and love into every fibre of his big frame.

The tide turns quickly and from the hunted criminal he becomes the worshipped hero. Twice the daughter of the saloon keeper is rescued from the clutches of death. The mad rush of horses on the country road as they are urged on to aid in the administration of justice give rise to a singular condition of anxiety as one half hopes that justice will be done and at the same time fervently wishes that the case go by default.

Excitement, sentiment and pathos are blended and one is assured a truly interesting picture.

THE TRAIN ON FIRE (July 11).—Denise is an orphan, and lives with her grandfather, who loves her dearly. Her beauty gives birth to a violent passion in the heart of the Squire, but his advances are sternly rebuffed, and he swears that he will have revenge upon Denise.

Sometime later the Squire ruins himself at the gaming tables. Without wealth and without friends he at last accepts a job as stoker on the railway. In this position he discovers that the engine-driver with whom he works is none other than Denise's husband. He remembers the insult of former days and awaits an opportunity to avenge himself. This comes when Denise travels up to town one day in the train driven by her husband. The Squire sets fire to the train, which dashes along wrapped in flames. Denise and her husband have a narrow escape, but the Squire meets with a dreadful end.

RAMO

A DOGGONE BARON (July 16).—Adolph Shultz sat in the little room behind his little delicatessen shop and cursed the fate that saw fit to cast him for a delicatessen merchant instead of a Baron. In the daily papers Adolph had read of the epidemic of heiress-seeking Barons and promptly contracted acute Baroneits. He lost his appetite for sauerkraut and potato salad and every time he looked at his plump Frau, or one of his seven children, he experienced a sensation about the same as a bad man's hereafter. There was no cure for poor Adolph's malady but an heiress and a mess of wild oats, so during his wife's absence, he sold his shop, packed his grip and departed.

Mary Alden, a newspaper reporter was in court when Mrs. Shultz and her seven children broke in. She (Mrs. Shultz) filled the air with riot and requested the judge to rivet a pair of handcuffs upon runaway Adolph and bring him back.

At Kirby's farm there was great excitement. The Baron Dietrich had picked Madge Kirby for a steady listener of his love tales and Madge was delighted. A Baron for a son-in-law made Ma's heart flutter overtime.

Now, Farmer Kirby had no intention of splitting his fortune with a man he couldn't talk with, so every time the Baron asked for Madge's hand, Farmer Kirby got an attack of hesitation and called Peggy, the bull-dog, who showed his disapproval of the Baron by making half-moons with her teeth on different parts of his anatomy. In fact, Peggy assisted Farmer Kirby and Jack Hopkins, Madge's former suitor, in making the Baron as uncomfortable as possible, but his finish was made certain by the arrival of Mary Alden, the reporter, who came to visit the Kirbys. Assisted by Peggy, she prevented the pair from eloping, and to confirm her suspicion that Shultz was one and the same, she telegraphed for Mrs. Shultz.

Five minutes after the lady arrived, something that sounded like yells of mortal agony came from the tall grass back of the farm to prove that the lady was making good. So endeth the romance of Adolph—the doggone Baron.

MAJESTIC

THE INGRATE (July 12).—A New York broker was caught in one of the financial flurries for which Wall Street is famous, and lost his fortune. Like many others before him, he left the East to seek wealth in the gold mines of the West. Success did not come to him and he would have starved if a young prospector had not taken pity upon him and made him his partner.

A claim was located and gold discovered. The miner was taken ill, and his treacherous companion, taking advantage of his partner's helpless condition, took the gold and left his benefactor to die in the desert. The sick man was found by prospectors and nursed back to life. He discovered other rich claims and became one of the mining kings of the West, but cherished a strong hatred for the ingrate who had treated him so heartlessly.

Many years later, the rich mining man received a report from a detective, stating that his enemy was now a prominent Wall Street broker, and was conducting a fight for the control of certain railroad properties owned by an elderly capitalist. The ingrate, the detective said, was sure to succeed unless the miner chose to interefere.

And the miner did. The elderly financier, harassed and exhausted, received a visit from a grim man from the West, who placed his immense fortune at the other's command, for the purpose, as he expressed it, of "crushing the snake." Money is all powerful in the world of finance, and after a few days of fierce battle on the "Change," the treacherous broker came to the office of his elderly opponent to plead for mercy. He received none, and left a ruined man, but not before he saw the man who had waited long for the day of reckoning, the miner whom he had so shamefully treated.

The robbery of the desert had been avenged on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange.

THANHOUSER

FOR THE MAN SHE LOVED (July 8).—The ranchman's daughter had two suitors, both her father's employees. One was a clearcut intelligent young cowboy, energetic and ambitious; the ot'er capable in his way, but sullen and revengeful. The girl liked the first of the two, and as her father was quite content with her choice, the course of true love seemed to be running quite smoothly.

On one occasion while the girl and her father, escorted by the two cowboys, were off on a business trip, they camped on the summit of a mountain. The girl was standing at the edge of a cliff. Her bracelet fell off, and as all supposed, rolled thousands of feet into t e chasm below. She agreed with her father, however, that search for the jewel would be useless.

The favored cowboy planned a surprise, however. Part way down the cliff a ledge of rock jutted out, and he figured out that perhaps the bracelet was lodged there. One day when work permitted he rode away from the ranch and halted at the cliff. He tied a rope to a tree, lowered himself down to the ledge, and there made diligent search, being finally rewarded by finding the bracelet. Unfortunately for him, his rival had noticed his departure from the ranch, and followed him. In jealous rage the vengeful cowboy pulled up the rope, leaving his rival to die of exposure and starvation.

When her sweetheart failed to return to the ranch t at night, the girl was worried, and intuitively suspected that the rejected suitor was to blame for the strange disappearance. The next morning she saw him ride away and followed. He went to the edge of the cliff, to hurl taunts at his helpless victim, and then rode away. The girl, who had been in concealment, emerged after he had departed, and single handed rescued her sweetheart, who was unconscious and near death. When he had been revived he returned to the ranch, there to confront his enemy, who at first believed him a ghost, but realized when the hand of the law fell upon him that his plot had failed through the girl's devotion to the man she loved.

AN ERRAND OF MERCY (July 11).—A little American girl, returning home from Europe, where she had been studying art, met a young doctor on the steamer and fell in love with him. They were married soon after the steamer reached New York. Her parents, who lived on a farm in the West, were unable to attend the wedding, but the bride wrote them enthusiastically, telling them how happy she was.

And she was happy for more than a year after the marriage. Her husband was devoted to her and their baby, but in spite of his many good qualities he was of an intensely jealous disposition and resented the admiration which his pretty wife excited. Quarrels were frequent and finally the girl left him with her baby and returned to her parents leaving a note in which she said that she would never see him again and that she and the child were provided for. The husband believed that she had gone away with another man and plunged into the practice of his profession to forget a wife whom he deemed unworthy.

The young mother and her baby were tenderly received by her parents. The girl told them of the jealousy of her husband, whom they had never seen, and her indignant father told her that she must never return to him. In a short time the young wife died, and the little girl was brought up under the loving care of her grandparents.

The child's father, who had prospered as the years passed and was now a famous physician, left New York on a tour of the country. But success had not brought him happiness, for he was a lonely man. The train stopped at a little Western town and the physician noticed the conductor talking to a little girl of ten, just the age his own child was, he thought sadly. The conductor entered the car and told the doctor that the child's grandfather was dangerously ill and there was no medical help available. The famous physician left the train and accompanied the child to her home, arriving just in time to save her grandparent's life. He did not expect any reward for his errand of mercy and yet he received one, for he discovered that his little guide was none other than his little daughter.

THE TICKET-OF-LEAVE MAN (2 Reels) (July 7).—The play opens in the Bellevue Tea Gardens, just out of London, where a large company of folks are taking refreshments at the different tables. Among them, cunningly disguised, is Hawkshaw, a famous police detective. To him other detectives occasionally report. They announce the presence of old Moss, a receiver of stolen goods, and are warned to keep an eye on him. Soon after, Moss is joined by Jem Dalton, nicknamed the Tiger, a notorious thief. Hawkshaw had been on the lookout for him, and during the evening keeps a close watch on his doings. Dalton has in tow a good-looking country youth, one Bob Brierly, who, having received a small legacy, has come to London to see life. Falling in with Dalton that worthy has volunteered to show him around, and has contrived to lead him into such dissipations as drinking and gambling. The young man is completely unnerved, and flies to champagne to drown his remorse. Old Moss tells Dalton that he has a lot of "beautiful" counterfeit banknotes, and offers them cheap to Dalton if he will pass them. While the others are engaged May Edwards enters the gardens with her guitar and sings a song. She is rudely chaffed by some, unnoticed by others; but on approaching Brierly the country youth, though sadly out of humor, feels for her distress and gives her a glass of wine, and tries to soothe her by kind words as he learns that she is actually famishing. Brierly is led off by Dalton, and during his absence May turns dejectedly away. Brierly returns. Dalton had offered to lend him some money, but, saying that he had no change, got him to go into a little cigar shop which they were passing and get change for a twenty pound note. He did so, and returned to the gardens with the change. Meeting May, he tells her to cheer up from crying, that she looked like a little sister of his. Then he insists upon her taking a couple of sovereigns. She would fain refuse them, but he insists, and gives her his address. Dalton comes in—the detectives follow—and in an instant Hawkshaw grabs Dalton, but he breaks away. Brierly is, however, handcuffed after a brief struggle and carried off to prison. Three years elapse. May, by her industry and virtue, has gained friends and work. She is living resignedly in her neat room awaiting a letter from Brierly. He, poor fellow, had been tried and sent to prison for three years. He had behaved well, and had written as often as the rules allowed to May, who kept him in faithful remembrance. May lodges with a garrulous old lady, Mrs. Willoughby, who has a grandson Sam, at once the delight and terror of her soul. It turns out when Brierly is released from prison and writes May that Mrs. Willoughby is the very woman upon whom Brierly passed the twenty pound note, and led to the poor woman being obliged to give up her little cigar store. The released prisoner no sooner learns this fact than he manages to repay the woman her loss out of money which he had saved at Portland prison. Mrs. Gibson, a lady who had taken a very friendly interest in May, enlists her husband in the same cause and, after a while, Mr. Gibson, a rich private banker and bill broker, employs Bob Brierly as janitor and porter, and May as housekeeper. Brierly is smart, honest and diligent, and is about to be married to May, after which they are to live over Mr. Gibson's bank. But Dalton and Moss, in the course of their attempts to swindle Mr. Gibson by means of forged drafts, recognize Brierly, and on his refusal to let Dalton take impressions of locks to rob the bank, old Moss denounces him to Mr. Gibson as a ticket-of-leave man. The banker, indignant at being imposed upon by Brierly, turns him adrift, and he is reduced to the lowest ebb of poverty. May clings to him like a guardian angel all the time. At length, when Bob is just yielding to despair and has grown reckless of life, Dalton and Moss appear and get him to consent to aid them in breaking into Mr. Gibson's place. Hawkshaw, disguised as a laborer, is hovering about the taproom, apparently drunk, and when Brierly, having mastered all the burglars' plans, seeks for a person to convey a note to Mr. Gibson warning him of the plot, Hawkshaw makes himself known to Brierly, and arranges to entrap the thieves in the very act of the burglary. Sam Willoughby also becomes of much use at this juncture. The closing scene is strong, Dalton being overpowered and Moss and him taken prisoners; Bob becomes the husband of faithful May, and Mr. Gibson takes them both into his employ.

A POSSIBILITY (2 Reels) (July 14).—Some clubmen in New York, watching the suffragette parade from the club window, discuss the possibility of the final success of the suffragette movement, and the whimsical idea strikes one man to picture to the others what will happen in the future when women have become not only the equal but the stronger sex. The story then unfolds of the simple farm boy who is wooed by the big-hearted farmer girl and how the boy, while coy and coquettish of the girl's advances, still is possibly fond enough of the girl; how this gently budding romance is shattered by the advent in the village of an unscrupulous and wealthy clubwoman from the city who steals away the country boy's heart by her tales of the gay life of the city. The boy remains true to the virtuous principles taught him by his honest parents but does consent to an elopement, believing, however, that the handsome woman from the city intends to marry him on their arrival in New York. The elopement is successfully made and the boy's irate mother awakes too late to reach the unscrupulous woman with a shotgun and the pair are well on their way.

Fortunately for the simple-minded boy his country girl has suspected something wrong and followed the car to the city. There she succeeds in frustrating the schemes of the unscrupulous clubwoman and shows the weak but still honest boy how close he has come to a life that could only lead to shame and remorse. The country girl has a terrific struggle with the clubwoman for the safety of the weeping boy, but finally returns the now thoroughly awakened young man to his weeping father and irate mother. She succeeds in softening mother's stern wrath toward the erring boy, who has been more sinned against than sinning, and finally the young man, recognizing true and honest love, goes into the strong arms she holds out for him.

CRYSTAL

IN DEATH'S SHADOW (July 15).—Frank Perry, an American mining expert, is located in Juarez, Mexico, where he is looking out for the interests of and assaying the ore for Mr. Barrows, the wealthy mine owner. He lives at the hotel, and is attended by the native Mexicans. Carlotta, a beautiful girl, who was wont to bring Frank his meals at his little office, has fallen deeply in love with him, though Frank is unaware of her infatuation. Mr. Barrows calls Frank back to New York for an important consultation, and there Frank meets his employer's beautiful daughter Irene. The young couple are thrown into each other's company a great deal and their strong friendship ripens into love. Frank goes back to Mexico, and Mr. Barrows later on decides to visit his properties. With the return of Frank Carlotta is again happy and attempts in many ways to please Frank, and rejects the many offers of her countrymen. Mr. Barrows and Irene arrive at Juarez and put up at the hotel where Frank lives, which, incidentally, is run by Carlotta's parents. Pedro, a waiter, comes in for much abuse from Carlotta's father. Carlotta becomes insanely jealous of Frank's attentions to Irene. She pleads with Frank, but he cannot take her seriously. He explains to her in playfulness the workings of an assayer and some of the dangers attendant thereto. He shows her a bottle of cyanide of potassium solution and tells her of its deadly qualities and how it would cause sure death to any one taking any of it. The next day she sees Frank kissing Irene, and her insane jealousy getting the better of her, she determines to kill either one or both of them at the first opportunity. That evening Pedro sees her take some of the cyanide of potassium and put it into Frank's food. Carlotta's father starts to abuse Pedro and is choking him nearly to death when Irene returns and stops the cruelty. Pedro, out of thankfulness, informs Irene of Carlotta's doings, and that she is at that moment on the way to Frank's office with the poisoned food. Irene rushes out and rides furiously to the office. She arrives just in time to save Frank by knocking some poisoned food from his hand. Irene confronts Carlotta, who, admitting the accusation, is ordered from the office. She goes, leaving Irene and Frank in each other's arms, thankful that she was just in time to save her lover's life.

THE AWAKENING (July 18).—Irene Farwell, a selfish girl, breaks off her engagement to the man she loves and marries a man of wealth so that she will have the luxuries of life. The boy's heart and spirit are broken over the affair and his life ruined.

After five years of luxury the selfish nature remains unchanged and she exhibits a lack of consideration for others at every turn. Her modiste is unable to have her gown finished at a certain time. Irene threatens to withdraw her trade unless the gown is finished as promised. Fearing to lose her custom the modiste overworks one of her girls which causes the girl to lose her sight. The gown is finished on time but the thoughtless woman flippantly decides to wear another.

Her selfish nature again asserts itself when her sister appeals to her for money to save her invalid husband's life. Irene, instead of lending her the money, purchases a racing car and, unable to procure the necessary money, the sister is forced to see her husband die.

Seized with the speed mania, she neglects her husband's warning, with the result that she runs over a child, and is only brought to a realization of her selfishness when she finds it to be her own.

THE OPERATOR AND THE SUPERINTENDENT (July 16).—The lure of the West, its freedom—its bigness—appeals so strongly to Ellen, seated in her tiny hall bedroom, that she determines to answer an advertisement for a telegraph operator for a Western station.

Ellen is successful in securing an appointment at Tempuch, a very small Western station, and is escorted to her new office by Wilson, the superintendent of the Western division. A mutual attraction springs up between the two young people, and Wilson departs for this office, six miles distant, reluctantly.

The freshness and beauty of the new operator attracts the attention of one of the most notorious gamblers in Tempuch, who, after being scorned by Ellen, determines to win her. Later he proposes to her and in a rage at her refusal advances toward her, but the timely advent of the superintendent saves Ellen from further unpleasantness. The gambler is ordered away and the superintendent proposes to Ellen and is accepted. The gambler, returning, sees their fond embrace and vows vengeance.

He secures a couple of ruffians and, in company with them, goes to Ellen's office and, after a struggle, makes her a prisoner, but not before Ellen, during the scuffle, has had an opportunity to send a call for help over the wire to Wilson. The gambler and his pals take Ellen to a shack which the gambler has in the mountains.

Wilson, unable to get into communication with Ellen, in response to her frantic call, secures a handcar and, after a wild ride, finds Ellen's office in confusion and his sweetheart missing. With the sheriff's posse he pushes after the gambler, who, seeing the posse at a distance, gags and binds Ellen and puts her in an old well under the shack. Wilson and his men are about to leave, having failed to find Ellen, when Ellen accidentally hits her spur on a pipe running up to the room above. She taps her whereabouts in the Morse code on the pipe and Wilson quickly releases her, while the sheriff and his men keep the gambler and his pals covered.

Needless to say a new operator is wanted at Tempuch at once.

"101 BISON"

THE PICKET GUARD (2 Reels) (July 15).

"All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming,
Their tents in the rays of the clear autumn moon,
Or the lights of the watchfires are gleaming."

Reid, a Federal sentry, is shown on guard during the quiet of the night. A Confederate officer is seen to dispatch an advance picket.

"A tremulous sigh, as the gentle night wind
Through the brush-leaves softly is creeping,
While stars up above, with their glittering eye,
Keep guard for the enemy is sleeping."

The Federal camp is shown in slumber as the Confederate picket makes stealthful advance. He suddenly halts.

"There's only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,
As he tramps from the rock to the fountain,
And thinks of the two in the low trundle bed,
Far away in the cot on the mountain."

Reid, the Federal sentry, comes to rest upon his rifle and falls into a reverie. His vision depicts two children asleep, one of five years, the other three, beside his waiting wife.

"The moon seems to shine just as brightly as then,
That night when the love yet unspoken
Leaped up to his lips, when low murmured vows
Were pledged to be ever unbroken."

His reveries carry him back to the courtship days when he bashfully stood beside Mary and mustered courage to tell her of his love. She modestly accepted him. Later they are shown to be married in the green woods and depart with the churchman's blessing to their humble home. He takes his bashful bride in his arms and their lips meet in wedding kiss. Moments of their happy life unfold themselves before him—their first child, which made their sympathy and devotion as one.

Something stirs behind him—he raises his rifle, alert, but only for a moment. Then he continues his reverie.

"His musket falls slack, his face dark and grim,
Grows soft with memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep,
For the mother—may Heaven defend her."

His memory shapes pictures of a happy leave of wife and chidlren for the village where Lincoln's bulletin met his gaze calling for 75,000 volunteers. He thinks of loving ones at home and turns from the call. His friends taunt him. The end could be but one, and a sad parting of home ties follows. He recalls his Lieutenant's departure from an aged mother and other soldiers in their leave—surely none were sadder than Mary as she stood with children in farewell to soldiers as they marched away in answer to Lincoln's call.

"Then drawing his sleeve roughly over his eyes,
He dashes the tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun close up to its place,
As if to keep down the heart swelling."

Reid is seen to supply action befitting to the above stanza. In the meantime the Confederate picket sees his chance and prepares to fire as Reid, with shouldered gun, continues his guard.

"He passes the fountain, the old blasted tree,
The footsteps are lagging and weary.
Hark! was it the night wind that rustled the leaves?"

Reid is seen to peer cautiously into the darkness as the Confederate picket prepares to fire.

"Was it moonlight so wondrously flashing?
It looked like a rifle.
Ah! Mary, good-bye,
And the life-blood is ebbing and flashing."

Reid is seen to sink in death to the ground and the sleeping Federal camp rise to meet the advancing foe.

"All quiet along the Potomac, 'they say,'
Except, now and then, a stray picket
Is shot, as he walks his post to and fro
By a rifleman hid in the thicket."

A village scene shows the arrival of news from the front. All hurriedly gather for news of their loved ones.

"'Tis nothing! A private or two now and then will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost——
Only one of the men."

Mary comes on the scene in time to learn the news of her husband's death. She swoons beside those who rejoice over their own good fortune.

"Moaning out all alone the death rattle."

The widow is seen seated at cabin door in thought, her children clinging to her.

"All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
No sound save the rush of the river,
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead,
The picket's off duty forever."

PILOT

SANITARY GULCH (July 10).—Cliff Cole, agent for the Klos-Shave safety razors, finds business very dull in Cemetery Gulch. He can make no sales at all, so wires his manager in Chicago to send the emergency squad to the town at once. Priscilla Long, a stenographer in the office, and Mildred Shaw, another one, are dispatched to aid Cliff.

They arrive in the town. Priscilla is slightly disguised as a maiden aunt and Mildred is supposed to be her niece. When the heavily bearded men try to show Mildred some attention, Priscilla repulses their advances with an atomizer containing a powdered disinfectant, explaining that whiskers are lurking places for germs.

Two of the more interested of the men decide to shave, and arouse the French barber from his lethargy of "no business." They are cordially received by the women then, and the other men note their progress and decide to do likewise.

The barber is shortly overwhelmed with business, which he is unable to take care of, and Cliff persuades the men to buy his safety razors and shave themselves.

Aroused by the idea of cleanliness, the men reform the town and change its name from Cemetery Gulch to Sanitary Gulch, posting the new name over the railroad station.

A vigilance committee ropes the men who will not shave and compel them to do so, even requiring that the hair be taken off "woolly chaps" which some of them wear.

The men make great progress in their attentions to Mildred and Priscilla, the barber grows fat off his earnings and Cliff sells many razors. When they decide finally that they have milked the town, the conspirators go to the depot to depart. As they wave an ironical good-bye from the rear of the train, the men realize how they have been tricked. There is just time for the now abhorred barber to make it. They shoot at his feet and he beats it for the train, while the men throw away their safety razors and take a solemn oath to never shave again.

WARNER'S FEATURES

THEODORA (Three Parts).—Many a misguided woman by her unreasonable love for a man has brought ruin and death not only upon her own head but his as well. It is only after it is too late that she realizes the utter folly of her infatuation.

Justinian, Emperor of the Roman Empire of the East, has, by his tyranny, brought down upon his head the hatred of his subjects.

One day the Empress Theodora, with veiled face, is passing through the market place of Byzantium, the capital of the Empire, when a riot starts against the Emperor. She is saved from the fury of the mob by a handsome stranger. Struck by the Apollo-like figure of her benefactor, she dispatches her slave after him with a note signed "Myrta."

Now, this is Andreas, a Greek, the leader of a band of tempestuous spirits who have organized themselves to avenge the wrongs of the people.

He sends back word to Theodora that he cannot meet her as she requests. Now the Empress has succumbed to a sudden passion for the handsome Greek, and so the rejection of her advances fills her with despair.

As the Emperor had that day issued a particularly imperious decree, the friends of Andreas decide that the time has come for the master stroke. That night they cast dice to decide who shall kill Justinian and Theodora. The fates decree that Marcellus shall undertake the dangerous mission.

Just after the conspirators have departed from the home of Andreas, Theodora, whom he, of course, knows only as "Myrta," comes to him. While there she discovers the death compact against herself and Justinian. Tearing the name of Andreas from the parchment and hastily concealing it beneath her robe she hurries back to the palace.

Theodora discloses to the Emperor the mutilated parchment which gives the names of the conspirators. He immediately orders their secret arrest.

When Marcellus enters the palace to assassinate the Emperor and Theodora he is surprised and captured by the Imperial Guard. During the torture which is then inflicted upon him, Theodora, in fear that he may disclose the name of Andreas, stabs him.

The next day, during the progress of the games in the amphitheatre, an attack, headed by Andreas, is made on the royal pair. It is not until the Greek is seized and bound that he recognizes Theodora as the woman he has known as "Myrta." Rage soon overcomes his amazement and he reproaches her most bitterly for the death of Marcellus.

Fears for her lover and fears for her own safety cause terrible strife in the breast of Theodora. The Emperor has become suspicious of her and is constantly on the alert for some proof of her infidelity.

When Theodora visits Andreas in his dungeon he reviles her most bitterly, disclaiming all feeling of affection and assuring her that she can never expect anything from him but hatred and loathing.

The unhappy Empress, in a frenzy of despair, hastens to Tamyris, a sorceress, and secures from her a love potion that will awaken the dormant love in the breast of Andreas.

Now, Tamyris is the mother of Amaron, who has been killed in the rioting in the arena, and she, thinking the potion is for Justinian, in a spirit of revenge, mixes, instead of a love potion, a deadly poison, which she gives to Theodora.

When the Empress returns to the palace she learns that during her absence Andreas has been tortured. When she summons him he upbraids her afresh. Overcome by pain and the effect of his exertion he swoons. While in this state Theodora gives him the magic draught. Under its influence he revives, only to start his reproaches anew. Suddenly a peculiar change comes over him; his limbs stiffen, the eyes turn glassy and convulsive shudders seize him. The poison of Tamyris has accomplished its end—Andreas is dead. The awful realization causes Theodora to fall in a dead swoon across the body of her lover.

In this position she is found by Justinian. When Theodora is revived she learns that her doom is sealed. Entreaties and implorings are in vain. The executioner is ordered to do his duty. With one last look at the body of her lover Theodora resigns herself to her fate. A few quick turns of the garotte and all is over. Theodora has sowed the wind and reaped the whirlwind.

I am not the Guy that put "beans in beanery," but—

I am the Guy that made a lot of exhibitors rich by inducing them to discard "mere" screens and install "MIRROR SCREENS."

And if you buy a "MIRROR SCREEN," you will say that I am the Guy that put beans in your box-office by drawing the biggest crowds you ever saw.

The "MIRROR SCREEN" gives Class and Tone to your house.

It makes friends with your patrons because it is easy on the eyes.

It makes Motion Pictures Clear as Crystal Glass, without haze, like other screens so-called, gold, silver, imitation mirror, etc. You can take 50 cents worth of dope and paint a ray and do better than these.

But there is nothing like a "MIRROR SCREEN." So don't get mixed up.

It is a real mirror, finer in quality and finish than has ever been produced.

Get the money and be up-to-the-minute.

$1,000 that it can not be equaled.

The presence of the Goodwin Corset is not visible beneath the gown, neither is the wearer conscious of being "corseted."

The beauty of the picture depends upon the figure and appearance of the actress. Both are perfect, when wearing a perfect corset.

1913

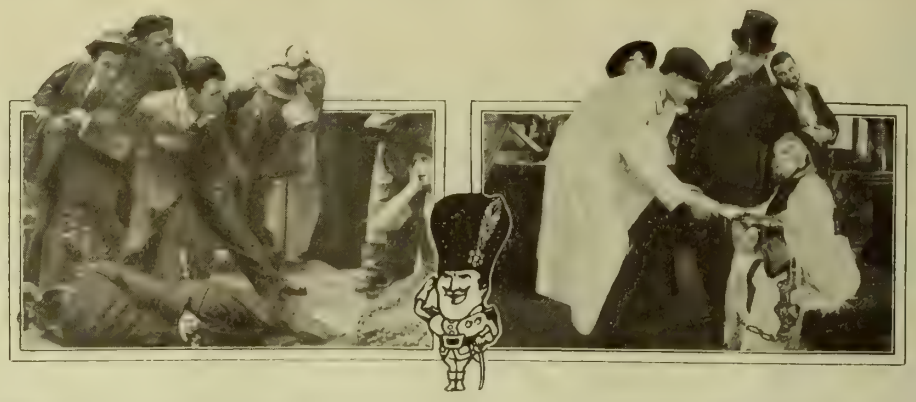
FANTOMAS
"Under the Shadow of the Guillotine"
Gaumont Release July 15th.



RELEASED SATURDAY, JULY 19.

"The Ne'er to Return Road"

Mrs. Otis Skinner wrote this story. A man finds his wife in a dance hall with another man. A shot—and the intruder falls dead by his own hand. The husband gets a life term, escapes, and staggers, half dead from exposure, into the home of the dead adventurer's mother. What did that mother do? Don't miss this Selig film in two reels.

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JULY 23.

"Home, Sweet Home"

A successful man and his wife wanted his father and mother to live with them. The old home was sold, so was the furniture and the old horse, and into town they moved. How comfortable and unhappy they were! But they got everything back and went home again, and—well, it's the kind of story that works straight into your heart and leaves your eyes misty. The Lubin players appear in the sure-fire success in two reels.

Four of a Kind That Make a Full House For You

The same standards of reel excellence are behind every multiple feature and every single reel film that comes to you in General Film Service. It is the kind of excellence that fills your motion picture house at every performance—the kind that builds up your reputation, day by day, and lets your patrons know that whenever they come to your theatre, they are sure to see the best that brains and critical care and tremendous staging resources can supply.

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 21.

"Tapped Wires"

The rivalry of two news syndicates is reflected in the humorous feud between two office boys. One of them discovers the leak that destroys every exclusive story of his company, and then things hum. A railroad wreck, a little sister reported dead and a game kid who sticks to his job through everything—these are the human elements of this gripping picture by Essanay in two reels.

RELEASED FRIDAY, JULY 25.

"Honor Thy Father"

A loyal girl promises her dying father never to let his money pass into the hands of his scheming wife and dissipated son. She falls ill, they bully and threaten and finally plan to drug her. The violent measures visited upon her when she escapes, and upon her lover after he takes her part, provide a story packed with rapid action. Cines-Kleine produced this rattling good picture in two reels.

I am not the Guy that put "beans in beanery," but—

I am the Guy that made a lot of exhibitors rich by inducing them to discard "mere" screens and install "MIRROR SCREENS."

And if you buy a "MIRROR SCREEN," you will say that I am the Guy that put beans in your box-office by drawing the biggest crowds you ever saw.

The "MIRROR SCREEN" gives Class and Tone to your house.

It makes friends with your patrons because it is easy on the eyes.

It makes Motion Pictures Clear as Crystal Glass, without haze, like other screens so-called, gold, silver, imitation mirror, etc. You can take 50 cents worth of dope and paint a ray and do better than these.

But there is nothing like a "MIRROR SCREEN." So don't get mixed up.

It is a real mirror, finer in quality and finish than has ever been produced.

Get the money and be up-to-the-minute.

$1,000 that it can not be equaled.

MAKE THE FOLLOWING

ANNOUNCEMENT

TO THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA, ASSEMBLED AT THE GRAND CENTRAL PALACE.

That they have produced a three-reel film of exceptional merit. The following gives some idea of the magnitude of the subject:

PRELUDE

"And when He came near He beheld the city." St. Luke: 19.14.

Out of a sunrise, along the Palisades, a white-robed figure, Christ, approaches, and dissolves into The Presence.

PART I
THE EVIL OF IDLENESS

A miserly old man exacts toll from women of the underworld and maintains his son in luxury and idleness at college. Later the son becomes enamored with a girl of Chinatown and unwittingly is involved in the robbery of his father, but is saved by The Presence.

PART II
THE EVIL OF CHEATING

A scene in New York Public School. During examinations one of the students is tempted to cheat in answering her questions, but her "Conscience?" prevails for the better.

PART III
THE EVIL OF GAMBLING

A poolroom scene; the gambler loses all his money while his family suffer at home. A newly awakened "Conscience?" causes him to see his errors.

PART IV
THE EVIL OF DISSIPATION

A Lobster Palace showing the dissipations into which the thoughtless are sometimes unwittingly plunged. A typical New York Cabaret scene.

AFTERMATH

After re-awakening our "Conscience?" in all these scenes the figure of Christ is seen to dissolve into the sunset and disappear into the distance.

FRATERNITY

WHAT a wonderful word this is and how much superior to the universal brotherhood of man! One thought especially in my mind is a sentiment expressed by the greatest teacher of to-day, Abdul Bahai, who said, "Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country, rather let him glory in this, that he loves his kind," and such a sentiment as this seemed to permeate the whole atmosphere of the convention and exposition of the National Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America in session assembled at the Grand Central Palace this week.

Men from all quarters of the globe assembled here, and it brought to my mind the saying, that, "one touch of nature makes the whole world kin," indeed we were of one kin; everyone had a greeting for everyone else, and a true fraternal spirit permeated the building. True, there were clashes of wit; true, there were angry words spoken; true, there were expressions of opinion that did not coincide with everyone's ideas, but that is perfectly natural in such an assembly, but at the bottom of it all true fraternity held full sway. How magnificent, how grand, how noble is Cinematography that can do such work as this to cement every tribe and every people together in one vast assembly.

Looking back along the vista of years, when Cinematography first opened up as a side line in some obscure store show, which were an eyesore to many, and all the developments of to-day, where the highest educationalists in the land, the brightest intellect of to-day assembled in conference to spread the truths of freedom to the whole world, cementing and bringing closer men and women so that in a little while universal peace will prevail, and war will be no more, through this great and growing industry; this truthful record of the world's doings, the greatest educational factor of to-day—Cinematography. It is doing all this. Ay, and more.

It can truthfully be said it was good to be there, and when I looked round and heard the grand sentiments expressed by everyone present at this exposition, the thought uppermost in my mind is that every nation and every tribe ought to be thankful to the first inventors of the Cinematograph camera, the film, and the projecting machine that shows such a wonderful advance.

The following telegrams were received by Mr. J. B. Phillips, president of the Texas Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association, the first from the Mayor of Ft. Worth, and the second from the Chamber of Commerce.

J. B. Phillips, Texas M. P. Exhibitors, Grand Central Palace:

I wish to express to the president and the members of the moving picture exhibitors my best wishes for a successful meeting, and would like very much to have them here for the next convention and I wish to extend them a most cordial invitation to hold it here. You had the keys of the city when you left and you have my permission to turn them over to the members of your convention. M. F. Milam, Mayor of Fort Worth.

J. B. Phillips, President Texas M. P. Exhibitors:

The citizens and business interests of Ft. Worth through the Chamber of Commerce extend to you their best wishes for a pleasant and successful meeting and most cordially invites you to hold your next international convention in our city. It will be an honor as well as a pleasure to entertain you and I hope you will come with us.

Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce,
R. O. McConnach, Secy.

Read the above and the sentiments expressed therein will convey what I have been trying to teach for so long a period, that the most respectable, the most elevating, the most uplifting movement of to-day is Cinematography.

Alfred H. Saunders.

CONVENTION NOTES

New York State opened the convention very auspiciously on Saturday, July 5th. Incidentally, the Imperial Hotel was busy receiving in her capacious arms the delegates from all over the state and country, commencing with the 3d and 4th of July. It was good to greet the old faces and see the smiling new ones.

Everyone was in the happiest frame of mind, and seemed to have come Eastward with a purpose. Every man, who has anything about him, always turns his face to the East, where the great power of the universe creates light, life, and liberty, and so these delegates to the Mecca of the East, the greatest city of the whole universe—New York—had a great surprise and a hearty welcome.

Samuel Trigger, the hard working and genial president of New York State Exhibitors' League, was always on the jump, with hand extended and a hearty welcome to everyone. He opened the proceedings promptly at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 5th. The following were delegates to the convention and officers elected for the state:

Albany Local—L. C. Smith; Mr. John C. Davis, State Treasurer. Delegates.

Utica Local—Mr. Wm. Dukay, president; Mr. Linton, Mr. J. E. Rierdon and Peter Karl; the last three being delegates

Syracuse Local—B. E. Cornell, first vice-president; N. D. Gibbons; Mr. Lowery, Mr. Auburn, delegates.

Rochester Local was represented by the president, A. L. Wilff, Buffalo; Mr. J. B. Friedman, Messrs. Harry Marsey, John F. Miller, Gettel.

Binghamton Local—H. L. Fox, president; Irvin L. Davis, delegate.

Yonkers and Westchester County Local represented by Mr. Samuels, president.

The official delegates of New York Local No. 1 to the State Convention were: Wm. L. Hilkemier, Grant W. Anson, A. Bauernfreund, Eugene N. Moore, N. L. Fleischman, W. L. Macnabb, Aaron A. Corn, Rudolph Sanders, N. Needle, J. A. Cortel, Frank Tischenor, Samuel H. Trigger, state president; L. W. Rosenthal, state secretary. Thirty-one officials beside the state officers and thirty-one alternates.

ABE SELIGMAN
Delegate from New Orleans.

Samuel Trigger, president; Mr. B. E. Cornell, re-elected first vice-president; second vice-president, Mr. H. L. Fox, of Binghamton; Wm. Dukay, elected state secretary; state treasurer, John C. Davis.

After the business of the meeting a most enjoyable banquet was served in the large assembly room of the Imperial Hotel, and was the inauguration of the festivities for the coming week. The principal address was that of welcome by M. A. Neff, the national president, answered by Samuel Trigger in a few felicitous words. Then the delegates were packed in automobiles and wheeled away to that place of blazing splendor of electricity—thanks be to Thomas A. Edison of turning darkness into light—another symbolism of the state of man's mind. We all need light, more light. I refer to Coney Island, and a most enjoyable time was spent at Luna Park, wending our way homewards in the wee small hours, a tired but happy crowd ready for the rest of the first day and the beginning of the full business on the Monday.

UNIVERSAL DAY

Ye Editor was kidnapped away from the Exposition to take a trip on the Universal autos and Fifth avenue busses to the Eclair Studio. At the time on the part of Ye Editor there was much demurring and trying to get out, but the chains were tightened round so tight, locked and double locked that it impossible for him to escape the penalty, but after all was said and done it was worth the agony of the kidnapping to undergo the delightful ride to Forty-second street, over to Weehawken Ferry, up the Palisades, not to forget to mention the escapades we had to go through, the ducking and the dodging of heads for those who were on top of the busses to escape the treetops, the various rocks and jaunts and shakes that all and sundry had to undergo, putting one in mind of the Rocky Road to Dublin on an Irish jaunting car.

Some of the ladies lost their plumes, some men had their heads bumped, not with a blackthorn shillelah, but the branches in the trees. More fun was got out of this, and it put one in real good spirits for the visit of the Eclair Studio, where on our arrival we were immediately cinematographed for the cause of posterity. This in itself was a special fête, and I might incidentally remark here that the cameras were working at 4 o'clock, and by 8.30 in the evening Eddie Roskam had got the negatives developed, a positive made, and was exhibited in the ballroom.

After looking through the studio we were taken to the Casino at the Palisades Park for dinner, which was put up in the usual shore dinner style of that notable place. Some of the younger element, including a delegation from Chicago, took in all the sights and sounds that the Palisades Park had to offer. This caused great amusement to the other visitors, and so the time went on until 11.30, when a well satisfied crowd mounted the busses and had the little experience of the afternoon repeated on the return journey.

Thankful to say we all arrived safe and sound at the Hotel Imperial at 1 o'clock Tuesday morning, when some of us wended our way to our beds, which we reached—well, perhaps it would be wise not to say what time we did—but everyone present voted the Universal, and especially Joe Brandt, that wonderful genius of organization for handling the crowd in the admirable manner in which he did, and the whole of the delegates present finished up with three cheers for Joe and the singing of "For he's a jolly good fellow."

Richard Spencer, scenario editor of the N. Y. Motion Picture Corporation, and a well-liked gentleman both East and West, will be in New York the latter part of July on a brief vacation from the Coast. He is one of the best informed technical editors of the silent drama and has to his credit many of the feature successes of the past year.

Ford Sterling, Keystone comic and leading man, was painfully burned during the taking of a scene last week at the Los Angeles plant. Ford was seated in a taxi when the machine caught fire. He stuck manfully to his seat until the scene was completed although by that time the flames had penetrated the inside of the taxi and Sterling's hands were considerably burnt. Another case where Ford placed his "art" above all else.

EXPOSITION IMPRESSIONS

By Horace Vinton

(The Mahoney)

It is the beginning of any undertaking or enterprise that augurs for success or failure.

An auspicious and timely opening is what we are trying to find for our story.

It's "dollars to doughnuts" some contemporary will say: "The First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, at Grand Central Palace, opened midst a blaze of glory."

So we don't want that. Or—

"The greatest event in the history of the Motion Picture Industry inaugurated its première at the Grand Central Palace, and was an unqualified success."

So we don't want that. For the very logical reason—

With such names as those responsible for the arrangement and development of so gigantic and intricate an enterprise as this Exposition presented, it was a foregone conclusion that nothing but success could result with such masters of organization as:

M. A. Neff, founder and president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Samuel Trigger, president New York Local and State Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

Frank A. Tichenor, chairman executive committee, First International Exposition Motion Picture Art.

F. E. Samuels, secretary.

William A. Hilkemeier, chairman of the entertainment committee, and other brilliant executive heads, for all are born generals in the world of commerce and entertainment, who might have achieved distinction in the military field, so marked was the tact and diplomacy shown in the formation of this marvelous exposition.

With the first vast assemblage, on Monday, it was a pleasure to note the perfect sequence of harmony prevailing among the multitude that congested that enormous structure, the Grand Central Palace.

Whatever feeling of animosity, whatever grievance may have assailed the minds of those interested for their enemies was entirely forgotten in the seeming fraternal and kindly attitude of all, and an evident desire to labor in unison for the advancement and general good of an industry that has been so prolific of benefit to all engaged in it.

There is no profitable business, no game of chance, no offered opportunity to "annex wealth," that has not been madly pursued by humanity since prehistoric times, when "might" was "right," no matter how wrong it was. But because we have in this enlightened era dishonest bankers, cheating merchants, crooked lawyers, insincere preachers, fraudulent manufacturers and grafting policemen (we should have starred the latter), it does not necessarily follow that the major part of humanity in this grand world of ours are not honorable in purpose and intent.

Such a condition was evidenced at the opening of the first annual exhibition of the product of the various manufacturers and promoters of the great and growing industry of the Cinematograph art, July seventh, nineteen hundred and thirteen.

To the unthinking the magnitude of labor entailed in laying the foundation for this gigantic undertaking is not comprehensive.

It is but a little more than three years since President Neff conceived the idea of a brotherhood of exhibitors of motion pictures along co-operative lines, having recognized the advantage and benefit of co-operation in other channels of commerce. During the above-named period he has lived with one idea; the dream of his existence has been the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Being a pioneer exhibitor, operating a circuit of picture theatres, more than six years ago, when the game was comparatively in its infancy, with that alertness and keen perception for which he is noted, Mr. Neff perfected his plans, which resulted in the first convention, held in the fall of 1910 at the Southern Hotel, in Columbus, Ohio. An extensive correspondence was necessary among city clerks and officials whose aid he sought, but his labor was fraught with but meagre returns. Nothing daunted, he next invoked the assistance of the various journals, and asked for a list of the moving picture theatres, and the names of their proprietors, in the towns and cities contiguous, and finally received sufficient encouragement to warrant him calling the Columbus convention.

The organization was then formed and temporary officials elected, consisting of M. A. Neff as president; W. A. Pittis, of Conneaut, Ohio, vice-president; W. O. Yard, of Wellston, Ohio (since deceased), treasurer.

Two months later, in November, 1910, another meeting was held, when the officers, with the exception of Mr. Yard, who had died in the interim, were regularly elected to serve for the ensuing term of one year.

Mr. Neff's executive acumen and deft handling were soon evidenced, for the league rapidly increased in membership, until he felt warranted in recommending a national convention, which was held in Cleveland, Ohio, in August, 1911.

The second national convention in Chicago, one year ago, is of too recent date to require comment. It was a huge success, and placed the league on a firm basis.

That "great oaks from little acorns grow" is exemplified in the present majestic proportions of the efforts of Mr. Neff and his able aides, Mr. Trigger, Mr. Tichenor, Mr. Samuels and Mr. Hilkemeier.

There are numerous claimants for the honor and distinction of being the real promoter of the International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art and Allied Trades, but the fact remains the same that this majestic Cinematography oak grew from the diminutive acorn planted in 1910, and was cared for and nourished since that time by M. A. Neff.

It is a difficult task to originate successfully. It is a simple problem to improve, once the lines are drawn.

Monday's Proceedings

Even the elements seemed propitious, for after a protracted siege of sweltering heat the day began with a balmy San Diego breeze and brilliant sunshine. It seemed as if Cinematography luck extended to weather conditions.

Some trifling confusion was noticeable in the final preparation of the various exhibitors, but aside from a little hammering necessary to arrange the final decorations, smoothness obtained everywhere.

Such mighty changes had been wrought in the interior decorations and arrangement of the main hall that it was scarcely recognizable. A beautiful blending of green and white and gold met the eye in every direction. The division of the main floor into various booths, with white pillars, with clinging vines, and a background of green burlap, lent a most delicate and artistic effect to the surroundings. The booths were for the greater part suggestive of arbors or vine-covered pergolas.

On the mezzanine floor were located three splendidly equipped theatres, where the pre-releases of the General, Kinemacolor and Mutual film incorporations were shown daily to vast numbers, who were gracefully welcomed by Mr. L. F. Blumenthal, the national vice-president, State of New Jersey.

One of the first things to meet the eye at the top of the steps which led to the main floor was the widely known and popular trade-mark, the "sunflower" of the wonderful house of Gaumont.

This company undoubtedly enjoys the distinction of being among the oldest, if not really the oldest, of all those engaged in the art. At any rate, they exhibited the first films shown in this country commercially.

Mr. Edgar O. Brooks is now the advertising manager and press representative of this world-famous company, and his long and valuable experience in the publicity departments of the various theatrical enterprises with which he has been associated in the past will doubtless render him fit for the important position in which he is placed.

A little further along, in the same aisle, the mystic name Kinemacolor beamed a smiling recognition.

We were informed by Mr. Williard Holcomb that this representative company of all that is beautiful and artistic in the world of motion picture had a number of surprises in store for the visiting delegates and the public in general, and he told the truth, for their several pre-releases, shown in the General Film Company's theatre, were marvels of Cinematography beauty, in technique, theme and portrayal.

To the right of the main entrance the beautiful pergola of the National Cash Register Company, resplendent in palms and other tropical decorations, its handsome willow furniture looking inviting and restful.

Special commendation is due the General Film Company for one of the most elaborate and extravagant displays among the space holders.

Their booth, or, more properly speaking, their several booths—106, 107 and 108, off the second aisle to the left—being a marvel, of artistic beauty and arrangements. Mr. Farrell and Mr. McChesney are in charge.

MISS DOROTHY KINGDON
Representing the stage.

Taking as his perspective the Hudson River, from a corner of the grounds at West Point, showing the walls and turrets of that historic pile of army reminiscence, Joseph Szenpretery, the head of the construction and decoration department, showed great skill, and invention.

In addition to the space above mentioned, the General Film Company equipped a handsome theatre on the mezzanine floor, to exhibit the product of the various companies they represent.

Representatives of the famed Edison Company were to be seen in their attractive quarters, tastefully fitted, at booths 325 and 326, where they were besieged during the day and night by a constant influx of visitors, professional and exhibitors.

MISS JENNETTE COHEN
Ladies' Entertainment Committee.

One of the greatest crowds were noticeable in and around the Mutual Film Company's quarters. Souvenirs of various description and carnations were their offerings.

The attractive space occupied by the Universal Company, presided over by Harry Cohn, who extended a cordial and courteous welcome to visitors, was deserted after the noon hour, as the various delegates in charge of that indefatigable laborer in the field of the "film," Joseph Brandt, had departed on a visit to the Mecca building and studios of the Universal.

Just prior to the exodus of the exhibitors as guests of the Universal, we had a hurried visit from the charming ladies composing the committee of entertainment.

Oh! such beautiful teeth. Beautiful eyes. Entrancing smiles.

There was the vivacious and interesting Mrs. R. L. Macnab, vice-chairman, ladies' entertainment committee, and her charming aides; thoughtful and studious appearing Mrs. F. Marion Brandon, script editor, Eclair Company.

Beautiful Dorothy Kingdon, representing the Stage. Alert and observant Jennette Cohen, Lithography, looking as if she were ready to discuss anything from a 24-sheet, 4-color, stand, to a one-sheet black and white in the flat.

Modest and demure Miss Jeannette Haring. We are at a loss for an adjective to describe Miss L. Blumenthal, not being present, she was represented by a lovely proxy. Miss Sadie Forster and Miss Jeannette Ehrenberg—well, we just can't find words.

It was pleasurable to note the interest manifested in their various tasks, and when they departed we were sad at heart.

MRS. R. L. McNAB
Ladies' Entertainment Committee.

At precisely two-forty-three by our Howard a long line of sight-seeing cars and private autos, belonging to officials of the Universal Film Company, loaded with six hundred and more delegates from the various States, rolled majestically away from the building to the blare of trumpets and the sound of drums.

It was the one impressive sight of the day.

Jos. Brandt, in charge, it was a really wonderful sight. To note the clever manner in which he drew them together, for it is no easy undertaking to muster people from every nook and corner of so vast a building, and place them in conveyances without some argument or dissatisfaction, but Mr. Brandt, with the tact and diplomacy for which he is famous succeeded, without comment or criticism.

Among the States represented were: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Texas and Florida.

A few of the many visiting delegates were recognized as: J. H. Bennett, Nat B. Keen, G. L. Wonders, George S. Benjamin, R. Depkin, O. S. Weems, Wm. Kalb, E. B. McCurdy and wife, all of Baltimore. Joe Hurst, J. H. Redder, Chicago. George S. List, Frederick, Md. L. Ulman, Salisbury, Md. L. A. Young, Norwich, Conn. W. J. Younger, Durham, N. C. A. F. Parish, Richmond, Va. J. H. Hanson, Reading, Pa. Henry E. Reiff, Pittsburgh, Pa. W. L. Younge, Durham, N. C. Edmund E. Groff, St. Augustine, Fla. J. H. Aspinwall, Willimantic, Conn.

O. L. Jarodski, of Danville, Ills., owner and manager of the Colonial Theatre, one of the handsomest and most complete small picture houses in the State of Illinois, was also among the number.

They were first conducted to the executive offices of the Universal Company, in the Mecca building, thence to the Eclair and Cryteville studios, and finished the day at Palisade Park, where they were most lavishly entertained.

In the evening two bands and three sight-seeing cars met the Ohio delegation at the Albany Day Boat dock, and escorted them to the Grand Central Palace. Another event of the evening was a visit from a distinguished party of Russians, including the Russian Consul to the United States, sixty in all, members of Russia's Educational Business Mens Association, who were guests of Mr. Boushey, of the General Film Company.

Shortly after eight o'clock the immense hall was a struggling, swaying mass of humanity, which was an indication that before the end of the week the congestion would be so great it would be a problem to accommodate the mass of people interested in the art.

To hear the "knowing" prate about the moving picture losing its potency and popularity is "to laugh," for never in its history have indications pointed so markedly to the fact that it is still in a primary state of existence.

Actors, artists, lawyers, doctors, every known trade and profession were in evidence. Among the notables in attendance Monday night were members of the various Patents Company contingent, Lubin, Vitagraph, Kalem, Edison, Kinemacolor, the Independent faction were also prominent, representing the Mutual and Universal.

Yes! John Bunny was there, beaming and blinking, as the multitude followed him from place to place, and pleaded to shake the hand, attached to the body, that supports the head and shows the face that makes them "howl."

Paul Gilmore, matinee idol of a decade ago, still looking interesting was recognized among the visitors, and many wondered whether Paul was considering offers to enter the field.

Miss Lottie Briscoe, the gifted and charming leading woman of the Lubin Company, tastefully attired in a "fetching" importation, attracted universal attention. She was fairly besieged by hordes of admirers, who recognized her, and literally stopped the "big show" wherever she appeared.

Scores of actresses and actors, prominent in the world of filmdom, graced the large hall with their presence, and were the centers of attention when recognized.

Richard (Dick) Edmondson, the London representative of the American Film Mfg. Company, is here to absorb ideas, suggestions for reproduction among our English cousins. W. A. Corey, all the way from California, and L. J. Dittmar, of Louisville, were also strongly popular among the visitors to the "big show," Monday night.

Tuesday was Edison day. A departure was made in this instance from the usual proceedings on occasions of this kind.

Instead of escorting their numerous guests to inspect the wonderful Edison plant all day long large auto cars loaded with visiting delegates left the Grand Central Palace for a tour of inspection through the Metropolis.

The majestic Woolworth building, the Singer, the Flatiron, the Museum of Art, Public Library, the magnificent memorial to the Maine; after which a tour of inspection, taking in upper Fifth avenue, millionaire row and Riverside drive, visiting Grant's Tomb.

Many expressions of appreciation were heard among the Edison guests for the temporary relief afforded away from the moving picture atmosphere.

Souvenirs in the form of photographs were taken, which will be a lasting memory to the visiting guests.

Another event in the history of this wonderful display of man's ingenuity, energy and forethought was the attendance of the Chief Executive, of the Chief City, of the greatest State, in this grand Country, Mayor Gaynor.

Not popular in some directions, the possessor of a strong will and virile personality, acquired through many honorable years of association with the "bench," a man not to be led or controlled by any individual or party, he lent his presence to this great exposition, and in a telling speech, proved his fealty to the cause of Cinematography, as he has always done to any enterprise worthy the respect and consideration of honorably inclined people.

Frank E. Samuels, secretary of the International Exposition of Cinematography Art and Allied Industries, says he has never been in the political field.

We do not credit his statements; for no man who exhibits such a marvelous and untiring interest in his duties, such tact, such energy, such an equable, unruffled temperament, under the most trying and at times aggravating conditions, could have received his training among laymen.

His faculty for extemporaneous speaking is also strongly "politic," and his never ceasing smile indicates: "The labor" he "delights in, physics-pain."

One of the most attractive among the many lithographic displays is that of The United States Printing and Lithographing Company, presided over by Mr. E. J. Doolittle and his aides in the various departments, George H. Lux, P. W. Gillin and J. C. Trauth, all indefatigable workers.

Some marvelous and original specimens of work were displayed, among which, a five-color scene from the Panama Canal, a beauty, one sheet of Nathan Hale, and others of Monte Cristo, Prisoner of Zenda, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde attaracted much notice.

It is wonderful to see the great strides that have been made in the art of lithography as evidenced by these posters.

A party of heavyweights from Cleveland, Ohio, representative heads of the exhibitors and exchanges, among whom were recognized Samuel Bullock, general manager of the Erie Amusement Company; Edward Kohl, Exchange Mutual Supply Company; F. M. Kenny, W. J. Slimm (whose name is not in consonance with his personality) made things pleasant wherever they appeared.

Referring to the above: Mr. Kenny wishes it distinctly understood that, Mr. Maher may be a "peach" in Cleveland, but Mr. Kohl made him resemble a "dried apple" in New York, where first run reels are never burned.

Author's Note:

We disclaim responsibility for the above, we only know what Mr. Kenny told us.

One of the earliest visitors of the week was a gentleman, probably the best known and most widely read, of all those who "discourse" on the subject of the moving picture.

A man who has been quoted, imitated and copied in every country where space is devoted in the journals to the Cinematography art.

The first person to publish a work on the scenario as applied to the motion picture; we refer to William Lord Wright.

The task of doing justice to Mr. Wright's many accomplishments in the world of letters would be an effort too herculean for the writer.

Equally brilliant in verse and prose, a contributor to the various magazines, with a score and more popular books to his credit, he has found time to edit a daily newspaper of some prominence to give zest, as it were, to his literary appetite.

Mr. Wright is accompanied by his charming and attractive wife. They are here solely for pleasure and relaxation, as he rejected several flattering propositions to cover the exposition for various important journals in the West.

A complete and comprehensive report covering the space holders and their products, the Vitagraph, Edison, Famous, Kinemacolor, Lubin, Kalem, Pathe, players and others popular in the world of "filmdom" will appear in our issue of January 19th.

Watch for it.

WRAY PHYSIOC RESIGNS

Wray Physioc, vice-president and general manager of the Directors' Film Corporation, resigned yesterday as director of productions.

Mr. Physioc organized the Directors' Film Corporation last January, and created the well-known brand of Ramo films.

Mr. Physioc's resignation caused considerable surprise in moving picture circles. What the outcome of his resignation will bring is not yet known, but it is believed that Mr. Physioc will bring an injunction against the Directors' Film Corporation restraining that concern from using his Ramo trade-mark, which he claims to own.

"FANTOMAS"
(The Phantom Crook)

The house of Gaumont announces a big new series of cracksman and detective films, in which the cracksman plays the most important role. "Fantomas," the new "creation," is a gentleman-thief-yeggman-crook-burglar, even murderer, and in No. 1 of the series, entitled "Fantomas Under the Shadow of the Guillotine," we find Fantomas operating in Paris. Princess Danidoff's magnificent rope of pearls and cash to the tune of $15,000 disappear from her hotel; Lord Beltham is missing; M. Valgrand, the famous actor, is discovered in a drugged condition taking the place of Fantomas in the condemned cell; mystery succeeds mystery, and the solution to all the problems is—Fantomas. No. 1 is in four parts and enacted by leading Parisian artistes, including M. Navarre in the various roles of Fantomas, Mlle. Jane Faber (of the Comedie Francaise) as Princess Danidoff, supported by Mme. Renee Carl and Messrs. Breon, Melchior, Volbert and Naudier.

SCENE FROM "FANTOMAS"

EDISON NOTES

"The Greed of Osman Bey," an Oriental story by Edison, is notable for many remarkable touches that give realism to the atmosphere, not the least of which is a giant flamingo which struts majestically about in one of the garden scenes. His flamingoship seems quite reluctant to let Charles Sutton "have the stage," and stays right in the picture until the rapid approach of Sutton makes a dignified flight imperative.

C. J. Williams, maker of Edison comedies, was foiled the other day in an attempt to use a country house as a background. A buxom Teuton, on being asked the usual question, answered "Na, we don't want none." Mr. Williams explained that it was customary to pay for the privilege of using private property, whereupon she rejoined that the last time a man came to take pictures it cost her $1.50 and she never got the pictures, after which she slammed the door on the bewildered director's face.

Charles Seay's entire troupe has returned to New York after a delightful month in Georgia, during which they had the pleasure of meeting the Governor of Georgia and the Mayor of Atlanta. As a native of Rome, Ga., and the son of a prominent citizen of that State, Mr. Seay was in a position to lead his company into places hitherto sacred from the intruding camera. Atlanta opened its doors to them, figuratively and literally speaking, and they were royally entertained by many prominent people in the city. Going out into the country they found everywhere the same enthusiasm over moving pictures. Mabel Trunnelle and Herbert Prior were delighted at being recognized by many who, though they had never seen them before in real life, had come to know them on the screen. Miss Trunnelle was solemnly consulted by several aspiring Southern beauties as to the probability of their becoming picture-players if they came to New York. Arthur Housman, who was also with Mr. Seay, was immediately dubbed the comedian of the party by reason of the numerous comic character parts which he has been playing recently. Mr. Housman was easily able to live up to requirements, and came away with a well established reputation as a wit. Bliss Milford, another of the party, had her good time marred by a painful affliction of the eyes, which she stoutly maintained, in the face of Harry Beaumont's assertions, had nothing to do with the classic hook worm. Before leaving for the North the players gave a dinner to their hosts, at which several Atlanta officials were present.

Charles Seay tells this one on his camera man: They stopped off at Washington on the way North, and while walking down Pennsylvania avenue with one of Mr. Seay's political acquaintances they met Champ Clark, who was introduced simply as "Mr. Clark." The Speaker in the course of the conversation referred to several of his big national plans and, after he had departed, the camera man, who had not caught the name, said: "Who is that fellow, anyway? To hear him talk you would think he was somebody."

Frank McGlynn hasn't lost any of the "know how" during his absence from the Edison Studio, as his work in "The Bells" amply testifies. There is a power in his work that compels attention and admiration. We are glad to see him back.

RYNO REVERIES

The Ryno Film Company is being congratulated on their securing Mr. Glen White, formerly of the Universal forces. Mr. White will be featured in all forthcoming Ryno releases.

Sunrise last Sunday morning found the Ryno players busily engaged in the production, "Bride of the Sea."

They were using the pilot house of the good ship John P. Stevens that ran aground at City Island on Saturday night.

The hero slowly waded out to the pilot house and the director called for action.

With vain effort our hero raised himself above the window of the pilot house and yelled a lusty shout. A launch appeared on the scene. The hero disappeared and soon reappeared at the window with our heroine in his arms. Action then ceased.

This tends to show to what extreme the Ryno Film Company goes to in order to give its fans the most realistic and best possible.

Another feature of this picture is a wireless station in actual operation.

Edward Freiburger, who takes pride in the fact that he entertained President Wilson with a Panama Canal Lecture recently, stopped over for one day at the Exposition on his way to Chautauqua, where he will accompany the Kinemacolor Panama and Durbar pictures with pictorial and highly colored descriptive language.

HER ROSARY
Reliance Release July 16th.

MRS. BEN SCHULBERG AND MR. BEN

I would have put it the other way about only to transpose the cuts would show the newly married couple turning their backs on one another, and this would not do. Such a thing rarely happens on the honeymoon. I gave friend "Ben" (the only Ben in the publicity line) a send-off and good wishes an issue or two ago. Ben is one of the whitest and heartiest of good fellows, and looking at his "helpmeet" he certainly is to be congratulated. A. H. S.

THE YERKES TEMPLE BELLS AND CHIMES

When the Yerkes Temple Bells rang out in the Palace they certainly attracted attention and the interested visitors bore evidence to the value of the exposition as a medium of advertising. The bells have made friends for themselves and the Yerkes Sound Effect Company are proud of them as well as their chimes.

The New York Sunday Herald, May 15, made a feature story of the cruise of the yacht "Emeline," equipped with two sets of bells and one set of chimes. At the conclusion of this cruise the Herald had some more good things to say about them.

The owner of the yacht, Mr. Robert Graves, was so enthusiastic he ordered an additional set of chimes as soon as the "Emeline" docked.

The Readoscope Theatre in Montreal is putting in two sets of bells, and the Yerkes Company is so well satisfied with the impression they have made on the visitors to the Exposition that we can imagine their exhibit has not been in vain.

There will be quite an emigration under the direction of Superintendent Thomas Persons, of the Selig Polyscope Company, on July 18th. Among those who are scheduled to go to the California establishment are: Charles Clary, Harry Lonsdale, LaFayette McKee, Wm. Stowell, John Lancaster, Joe Hazleton, Harriet Notter, Lyllian Leighton, Miss Pierce, Hardee Kirkland and Messrs. Carson, Morello, Newman, Walker, Steiner and Allen.

Jack Hearn, son of James A. Hearn, the famous playwright, was the guest of J. W. Hartman at the Pilot studio last week. Mr. Hearn was delighted with the many courtesies shown him during his three hours' stay. The dining room just off the studio was of special interest. After taking a lunch with all of the artists, directors, cameramen, etc., Mr. Hearn said, "I have never before enjoyed myself so much. I had no idea that such lunches were partaken of by artists during their working hours. I always had in mind a hasty bite and maybe a glass of milk was all they had time for. The Pilot company should certainly be praised for the splendid lunches provided by them for their actors."

Mr. Albert E. Cawood, photographer of the General Film Producing Company, makers of the Herald Films, left New York, Saturday, July 5th, for the Arctic regions, where he will make a series of moving pictures of scenes and events in that country.

After an extended cross-country tour Mr. Cawood will arrive at Nome and will take charge of the expedition that has been "picturing" the Arctic regions for this company for the past three months.

Mr. Cawood and his expedition will make a series of motion pictures showing the true Alaska and other Arctic regions. The company will announce later the date of inspection of these films.

Mr. Cawood was formally with the Kalem Company.

Ed. Kaufman, formerly moving picture editor of the Philadelphia Times, has resigned from that position and is now publicity manager of the Ryno Film Company.

The First International Exposition of the Moving Picture Art at the New Grand Central Palace, now in full swing, shows the progress made in cinematography during the past decade. It is of great interest to the general public, exhibitor and the operator, and the crowds surrounding the exhibits fully attest that the moving picture has come to stay and is progressing.

Among recent visitors to the Kinemacolor studios were Lady Constance Richardson, the titled exponent of Terpsichore, and The McLaine of Lochbule. The latter owns the Island of Mull as well as castles and acres of Scottish scenery, to which Kinemacolor has secured the picture privileges with a view to filming several historic dramas. It is highly probable that the titled visitors will take part in these.

THE STRANGE WAY
Reliance Release July 19th.

Judge E. A. Rizor will portray the trial judge in Wm. Hamilton Osborne's dramatization of the serial story of "The Scapegoat," a two-reel "Flying A" subject to be released July 14, 1913. The portrayal is natural to a finish and nicety that could not be improved upon by the most accomplished actor.

Mr. James Harrison, of the "Flying A" players, has been on the sick list for the past two weeks from ptomaine poisoning contracted in a restaurant while on a recent visit to Los Angeles.

Mr. Ed. Coxen, leading man of the second "Flying A" company, suffered a painful accident while working in the picture entitled "The Poisoned Chop." In a scuffle with the gardener's boy he was struck on the mouth and an incisor tooth cut its way through his lip.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE MOVING PICTURE MACHINE

The Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of moving picture machines, have the largest display in their line at the Exhibition of the Moving Picture Art, at the Grand Central Palace, New York, July 7th-12th.

Their exhibit (Booths 341-348) exploits the evolution of the moving picture machine, from its inception to the finished product of to-day; also much interesting and instructive literature will be distributed.

NICHOLAS POWER

Mr. Nicholas Power, a pioneer in the industry, in an interesting interview says:

"To entirely cover the history of moving picture machines in a short article is impossible. Only the essential features can be mentioned.

"A bet was made in 1871 by the late Senator Leland Stanford of California, that a running horse at no time had all four feet off the ground. Edward Muybridge—an Englishman—by way of experiment, placed numerous cameras at regular intervals about the track, which by electrical contact, were "snapped" by the horse in passing. It proved that the horse always had, when running, one foot on the ground.

"This was not the first record of moving pictures, though it served to demonstrate their practicability.

"Records indicate that the first machine was patented by W. E. Lincoln in 1867. It comprised objects which, revolving rapidly, gave the appearance of motion; it possessed little value.

"In 1869 O. B. Brown patented an 'optical instrument' comprising a disk or moving shutter movement, which on revolving, projected objects with the appearance of motion. There were then no films and translucent glass was used. This was the forerunner of modern machines.

"Development dragged from then until the Muybridge experiment stated above.

"In 1880 Muybridge produced in San Francisco the 'Zoopraxiscope' which projected pictures (on glass positives) on a screen.

"Later Muybridge conferred with Edison regarding a combination of his machine with the Phonograph, then in its infancy; about 1883 he went abroad and held frequent conferences with M. Marey of the Institute of France.

"Marey first utilized the continuous film though it was George Eastman who brought it to its present state of high perfection, which greatly influenced the success of the moving picture industry.

"In 1893 Lumiere produced the 'Cinematograph,' the first machine to project from the film. Films then had only one hole on each side of each picture. Edison increased this to four on each side and in 1896 produced his 'Vitascope.' These machines became the models for the greatly improved article of to-day.

"Films then were very crude; permitting length of only 75 feet, which was an endless belt. They were threaded over spools contained in a box at the rear of lamp house, passing over lamp house to head of machine, thence downward through head, past projection aperture and back to spools. This exposed film at all times, which was dangerous.

"About 1900, longer films came in use which necessitated a change in handling at machine head. Films were then wound on a reel mounted on top of head. After passing through head they were piled on floor. This being dangerous ous and destructive, a receptacle was devised and fastened to the frame below reel into which the film passed. This soon gave way to a reel known as the take up reel, which received the film after it had passed from the upper reel through the head and before the aperture projected on screen where it was.

"These are a few steps in the march of improvement. My first machine was called the 'Peerlesscope.' I kept continually improving it, and in 1902 changed the name to 'Cameragraph' which to-day is well-known throughout the world.

"Our latest model No. 6A possesses every known device for safety—fire shutters which automatically cut off film from lamp while motionless; films shields, which enclose and protect films; fire valves, which prevent entrance of flame into magazines, etc. Stands are stronger and easily adjustable to any position; lamp houses and magazines are larger. Every part is made by us in our own factory under my personal supervision."

Concerning projection, Mr. Power said:

"Pictures cannot succeed without perfect projection. Our Cameragraph No. 6A renders absolutely clear, flickerless pictures. The longer the period of rest of each picture on the screen, the better the detail and clearer the picture. This is accomplished by means of our exclusive intermittent movement.

"You know that in projecting pictures the motion of the film is not continuous in front of aperture, each picture pausing long enough for proper projection on screen. Through our intermittent movement we obtain a longer period of rest for each picture which accomplishes perfect projection of pictures without flicker.

"A very annoying feature has been the losing of the lower loop due to poor patching of film, tearing of sprocket holes, etc., causing film to jump lower sprocket, with the probable tearing and necessary readjustment of film.

"This we overcome by our patent exclusive loop setter. To explain briefly:

"As the full movement at the upper and lower reel is continuous while at the aperture it is intermittent, a loop is necessary as a feeder for the take up or lower sprocket. If this loop is lost, the film becomes taut, machine stops and films may break. The loop setter instantly readjusts this loop automatically, keeping it always in force.

"This," continued Mr. Power, "is a brief review of the evolution of the machine end of this wonderful industry, whose vast possibilities are yet undreamed of.

"Our machines to-day are practically fireproof, and very shortly they will be foolproof.

"With the machine improvements, the film industry has kept pace. Pictures daily grow better and clearer.

"We feel a pardonable pride in our own growth. Less than two years ago, occupying humble office quarters and a small factory, we are to-day housed in the largest factory of its kind in the world, which is continually put to it to keep up with orders.

"Merit surely tells," said Mr. Power, "and the best evidence of this is: Power's Cameragraph sales represent over 65 per cent of all the entire moving picture output of America."

William H. Hickey, European representative of Kinemacolor, sailed on Saturday on the Olympic for a flying trip through France, Germany and Italy. Mr. Hickey greatly regretted having to miss the first International Moving Picture Exposition, but details in connection with the new international Kinemacolor productions—particularly the filming of the Maeterlinck dramas, "The Blue Bird" and "Mary Magdalene"—the latter with Mme. Maeterlinck in the title role, demanded his personal attention. Mr. Hickey will be back in four weeks, and hereafter will divide his year about equally between America and Europe, "Kinemacoloring" both continents, as it were.

Plays with a "Punch"

NO one can teach you just how to write plays with a punch. You must be up and doing and just write 'em yourself. Plays with a punch are rarely for the hack writer, the man who turns out the plots to order and, with the regularity of a machine, furnishes the comedy or drama to the voracious director. Plays with a punch are born, not made; they are the result of both inspiration and hard labor; and the "punch" or the "kick" comes to one like a flash. When it does come you must know how to entertain it, for you may refuse a "punch" the doorway of thought. It is hard to designate in cold type just what the "punch" to a play really is. As we stated before, it is not made to order, nor made by human hands, it is a product of talent, of observation and of brains. You may discover some particular "punch" yourself and, maybe, some other person will give it to you. It is up to you to make the "punch" a lusty one. We wrote a highly successful newspaper playlet once and the "punch" was handed to us without the plot. The Imp Company wanted a picture of newspaper life. We had at that time one long continuous newspaper picture, for we were on a news staff, but we hadn't the "punch." We said so. "Send us a script; make a woman break a form of type or do something," wired the editor. Like a flash the plot came to us; the editor had kindly presented us with the "punch"; and we had sense enough to recognize it. "A woman breaking a form of type; say, there's an unusual twist to that; there's a situation—a big situation! We saw the love existing between a managing editor and the girl; we disliked a secretary who, of course, also loved the girl. We could see him steal incriminating evidence from the girl's father, evidence long sought by the owner of the opposition newspaper, and send it to the managing editor. We could see the managing editor, firm in a sense of duty, refuse to "kill" the story despite the pleadings of the girl; and then we could feel the emotions of the girl who believed in loyalty to her father and nevertheless loved the managing editor. We clearly saw the scene in the newspaper office just before press time; the form containing the story being shoved to stereotype, the coming of the father and his daughter for one final pleading effort for the news suppression. We saw the managing editor sadly refuse, the foreman take up the form containing the type, and the girl seize the type-planing mallet and with it shatter the type locked in the form. That in brief was the story that developed in our imagination. It resulted from the "punch," or the unusual situation which was casually furnished us. Of course we had the eyes to see it, and the imagination to grasp it. You too, must foster these qualifications, if you would write plays with a punch. Sometimes the "punch" comes to you from within, sometimes it is unconsciously furnished you; but whatever the source, seize the "punch" and retain it.

The Reliance Method

Reliance officers and directors hold weekly meetings and go over the select scripts received. The scripts are voted upon by directors and scenario staff, without the name of the author being known to the voters. Reliance announces that the well-known authors continue to win on their merits, although every now and then a story by some person not identified with the magazine or book world is found among the accepted manuscripts. At last week's voting conference the following scripts were accepted for early production: "Rosita's Cross of Gold," by E. J. Montague; "The Social Secretary," by Forrest Halsey; "The Doctor's Dilemma," by George Hennessy; "Fairly Caught," by E. J. Carpenter. The assertion by Reliance editors that fiction writers are supplying a majority of the scripts, but upholds our argument that these literary workers are finally arriving. They cannot help but succeed in the end. They have experience in plot building and familiarity with tools of the trade. However, we again repeat, that there is room for all and that, as with Reliance, the name counts for little or nothing; it's the story that counts.

Magazine Rejuvenate

The July number of "The Photoplay Magazine" has come to our desk. This magazine suspended four months ago but is now controlled by new and energetic backers. It contains much entertaining and attractive matter exclusively culled from "Independent" sources.

An "A. P." Story

We read a very entertaining but highly improbable story the other day in which a pictureplaywright tells how he got his start. He says that he first broke into the newspaper business (he calls it "journalism") by running across a story, writing it out, and sending it to the Associated Press. He says: "The story was used in almost every newspaper in the country." The writer asserts he was unknown to the newspaper world. If this was a fact, we fail to perceive how the "A. P." would accept a "story" written in by an unknown writer. The "A. P." has a correspondent in every nook and corner of the United States. The "A. P." is also very particular not to accept stuff from those not accredited correspondents, or not known to the various headquarters. We happen to know a little something anent the "A. P." workings through long newspaper experience. Of course, the story is plausible. We just mention it because we feel that those having the ambition to write pictureplays should be given the facts. Beginners in the profession are being handed too many highly colored and visionary statements.

What We Object To

We have no serious objections to individuals who offer to revise and criticise scripts, although those capable of giving the script writer value received can be numbered on the fingers of one hand. Neither are we antagonistic to "clearing houses" which revise and correct manuscripts and offer them for sale, providing said clearing houses are honestly conducted and we know the abilities and personnels of the editorial staffs. However, we are not in favor of any "associations" of pictureplaywrights. Neither are we inclined to a scheme which is said to be conducted "without profit" yet requires a "membership fee" of one dollar from every writer wishing to submit a script. If the "Association" is purely for the benefit of the writers why is a membership fee of one dollar really necesary? Why not require say fifty cents for necessary postage for several submissions to various companies? This new bureau claims the services of "a staff of successful and prominent editors." Why not name them? We have requested further information anent this "association" and we are certainly open to conviction. But in view of the many misleading baits being dangled before the eyes of beginners in script writing, we cannot be blamed for eyeing this latest idea with a grain of suspicion. Our best advice to our readers is to save your money for postage and do your own criticising and revising. Read all moving picture publications, study the screen—and work. Then you will not need the services of any "association."

Doesn't Appeal to Editors

In the course of our work we receive many letters. We believe we can tell after reading a letter just about what ability is possessed by the writer. This includes long letters, short letters, in fact, all kinds of letters. Many script editors acquire the same knack, just as they can tell almost by intuition whether a script is really worth reading. The knack is acquired by long practice and experience with human nature. The other day we received a letter bearing a notehead something as follows:

> "My pictureplays have won favor with press and pulpit! I am author of" (and here followed a list of pictureplays all strung in nonpareil down one side of the sheet).

This sort of circus advertising does not appeal to some editors we know. The successful author, the man or woman who is selling work and getting paid for it, is very frequently modest. They do not stand on past performances but prefer to let their contributions stand alone.

Of course, the writer of successful pictureplays has a pardonable pride in successes. We wouldn't give a red cent for a writer who had no such pride. We have a list of our produced scripts, have on file a copy of every magazine or other periodical that has carried our work, and we suppose that every other writer has like records. However, the novelist does not run a list of his books down one side of his stationery; the clergyman refrains from recording the titles of his sermons in cold type on his letter-heads; the short-story writer does not exploit the name of every piece of fiction he has sold above his signature. If you are doing good work and selling your plots, the editors will know you without submitting personal stationery that looks like a library catalogue. Editors are not interested so much in the scripts that you have written in the past, the scripts of the right-at-present-juncture are what editors wish to read.

Fashion Note

It is believed that the dear old New England plot is coming in again. In several of the unsolicited scripts we have received recently and immediately returned, we have, in a brief glance, noted that the "Way Down East" plots are becoming real frequent-like. Bless 'em, how they will bob up serenely! We have had qualms of conscience believing that the very last New England plot ever produced was built by us two years ago and released by "Comet" as a Christmas picture. The old Vermont farm, the dinner, the eight-day clock, the kitten and the ball of twine were all there, and the shyster lawyer with the mortgage figured prominently. Then we thought the bell had tapped. But no; unless we miss our guess, there will be an epidemic of good old New England farm plots within the next few months. Desist, we pray thee, desist!

The Hall of Fame

E. V. Brewster, not only is editor of The Motion Picture Story Magazine, but he edits the Cauldron Magazine which should be read by everybody.

William E. Wing, a prolific writer of scripts, has signed a contract with William Selig and will furnish the Selig Company with his best work the next year.

Another newspaper man has done it in the person of W. M. Ritchey who has become scenario editor for the Western Lubin branch. Ritchey was formerly city editor of the Los Angeles Express.

Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, is one of the world's foremost authorities on the technical side of photography. He is a vegetarian and proud of it

Phil Lang, versatile editor of the Kalem Company, laughs when references are made to the product of the pictureplaywright schools. He doesn't care for such product.

W. R. Daly, Imp director, asserts that the script writer is the keystone of the arch of the moving picture, and William Robert is right!

Alfred Sutro, author of John Drew's most notable success says: "Some people visit the theatre to laugh and others, with equal determination to weep; but all hate to have their settled convictions disturbed; and above all, all hate to be puzzled."

Pertinent Pointers

Practice makes perfect.

There is a fashion in picture likes and dislikes Keep up to date.

The most deadly of all sins the pictureplaywright can commit is to be dull.

Additions to the Lubin editorial staff have not closed that market by any manner of means.

"Similar to magazine story," means just what it says. Try and make your plots dissimilar.

Put the laugh and the thrill into your synopsis. Do not just rehearse the bald action of your script. Give the editor and director a punch in the synopsis and do it quickly!

Good scripts continue scarce. "The good ones are coming from the outside; from the little fellows; the little fellows are writing the fresh ideas. not the staff writers," asserts Director Brenon, of the Imp Company.

The novel idea properly displayed is worth a bigger check than the novel idea that is improperly developed. The first goes straight to the director, the second has to be rewritten.

You have to work and work hard to become a pictureplaywright. Don't ask someone else to do your work for you. Learn to do it yourself and be independent.

Pictures are improving in quality. Producers have finally realized that the story is the rock foundation of the picture. Plots which would have sold a year ago are now rejected.

Script writing is a profession, not a mere knack. It is a profession requiring observation and hard study and the quicker one comes to this realization, the sooner will success be achieved.

A Dissertation on Love

We wrote a script once that was rejected by one editor for the reason that "there is no love interest." We submitted it elsewhere and it made a hit when produced. Love stories are not absolutely essential to make a picture go over and many beginners do not realize this fact. Love interest is essential, of course, with a certain type of director, but many a fine story has been passed up by the beginner for the reason that he couldn't figure out where the omniscient "one woman and two men" could be worked into the plot. In the books of Robert Louis Stevenson, master of fiction writing, we find little love interest. Stevenson never wrote a good love story and never really tried to. Dumas' "The Three Guardsmen" has thrilled millions of people, but Dumas never tried to introduce love interest of conseqence. Dragging in merely a conventional love interest has detracted from the value of many a novel and pictureplay. Don't get the notion that love is necessary for the pictureplay plot. It isn't. The monotonous love embrace at the tail end of the picture is the usual thing. Maybe you can write a plot about money, politics or science and keep interest centered on the one thing. If you have a gripping plot and don't exactly see how you can work in the love-lorn maiden, why, just leave her out. Maybe you will have evolved the unusual thing and that is what scores.

$1,000 Feature Scripts

We have had several script writers write in about the "$1,000 feature script" an "Industrial" Motion Picture concern is in search of. Out of the avalanche of scripts called in by the company's advertisement nothing, it is said, was found sufficiently available to draw more than $25 and $30 per script. We would like to hear from any writer who has ever sold this company a script for as much as $50 and we know that some of the best known and most successful pictureplaywrights in the country were foolish enough to be taken in by the advertisement, and did submit good work. We had something to say about this advertisement last week and one very successful author who was "stung" writes us: "Yes, I am sometimes taken in. Hermann, the Great Magician, once told me that it was only an intelligent audience that could be fooled." It was an intelligent bunch of script writers who were taken in on this particular scheme right alongside the beginners. Kindly be content with $50 for regular work and do not try for $1,000 per script with unknown concerns hereafter, no matter where such offers appear.

"The Tree and the Chaff"

Above is the title of a biblical plot written by Marc Edmund Jones and produced for the Selig Company by Lem B. Parker. The plot is of the something different variety and we give it prominence here in support of our contention that writers do not necessarily have to turn to the "triangle" and criminal world for their ideas. More wholesomeness is what is needed. We congratulate both Jones and Selig. We want to congratulate you, too!

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

After the Eclectic Film Company had with great pains secured a copyright on their five-reel production "The Mysteries of Paris," they were greatly surprised to learn of a copy of the film being shown in some parts of the country. Upon getting definite information to the effect that the Bijou Dream Theatre, Euclid avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, had completed arrangements for showing "The Mysteries of Paris" on June 2, 3 and 4, the Eclectic Film Company immediately got busy and placed the prosecution of their rights into the hands of their attorneys, who proceeded to Cleveland and started suit against the infringers. Judge Day, of the U. S. District Court, granted a writ for replevin the infringing film which was seized by U. S. Marshal Sanning together with all the posters that were found on the premises. The Eclectic Film Company has decided to fight this case with the utmost vigor to a finish, and will also proceed against any other copy of an infringing film that may show up anywhere in the country.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Jacob Weinrich has plans for a moving picture theatre to be erected at 112 Fairmont avenue. Cost, $13,000.

Freeport, Ill.—Walter McKillop will return to Freeport and will conduct a picture house show in the Brown building on Galena street.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Mension Realty Company bought lots at the corner of Ridge avenue and Dakota street as a site for a moving picture theatre.

WE are fearless of successful contradiction when we rise to remark that nearly every moving picture film is high-toned.

* * * *

We sympathize with the enthusiastic admiration expressed by the sweet girl graduates for certain film stars, but we would rejoice greatly if they would reserve their audible until time for singing the illustrated song.

* * * *

At 4 a. m. last Sabbath morning, the girl next door started practicing "Hitchey Koo" on the piano so as to be prepared for its accomplished rendition at a moving picture show that evening.

* * * *

It is not only attractive personality that is essential to the case of a moving picture stock company. We sometimes incline to the belief that more experienced actors and actresses are needed to make certain productions a joy forever.

It is with pleasure that we quote from a house organ a delightful description of an elevating and educational film about to be released:

> "A typical gambling house, showing faithfully the many devices used to lure the gold from prospectors will be the scenic feature. The roulette wheel, stud poker, faro bank, and other typical games will be fully displayed, with the motley crowd ranging from the swaggering bad man, the villainous pulque-soaked greaser, the blanket Indians, and other human flotsam. The story is tense and beautiful."

Parents will probably insist that their boys and girls view this edifying picture several times. The "pulque-soaked greaser" type should be especially appealing.

Eugene Valentine Brewster, brilliant editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, has dropped into the prophesying business. He quotes Cicero in extenuation, because Cicero always considered the best guesser the best prophet. Now The "Photoplay Philosopher" is a keen and far-sighted critic and some of his prophesies are worth repeating. Here they are: "Free competition will come. Theatres will all have a scale of prices for reserved seats. Plays will have a 'run' and will not be changed every day. Sensational film titles will be abandoned. There will be more realism in the pictures. The future will see better photography. The art of making up for the pictures will be improved. The poorer companies will die off along with inferior directors, actors, camera men, and the fittest will survive." These predictions are plausible and are optimistic. Speed the day when most of them become effective!

Here are some things accomplished by moving pictures:

Made the Stars and Stripes a familiar sight all over the world.

Brought all parts of the world so near together that even the poor may have, for a nickel, all advantages of travel.

Made famous people familiar to all.

Provided entertainment and instruction at reasonable prices.

Furnished places to spend an hour while waiting in small towns for trains.

Popularized education.

Exhibitors west of New York City believe moving pictures will ultimately:

Write the future history of our country and other countries.

Entertain guests on every ocean steamer.

Relieve travelers on trains of ennui.

Fill our churches.

Educate children and teach them to appreciate knowledge.

Become most popular section of our new railroad stations.

Moving picture theatres received ministerial endorsement in Chicago the other Sunday while their enemies were called either ignorant of the real character of the amusement or "not normal Christians." The praise for the moving pictures was given by the Rev. Johnston Myers, pastor of the Immanuel Baptist church at 2320 South Michigan avenue, in his Sunday morning sermon. The subject was: "Are Moving Picture Theatres a Blessing or a Curse to Chicago?" In part the Rev. Myers said: "The moving picture movement is one of the most far-reaching influences in modern society. There may be, as there is of everything else, some things which we wish were different, but taken as a whole the moving picture theatres are a blessing. Those who oppose them do not know their real character or they are not normal Christians. One of the greatest needs in modern American life is wholesome amusement. Life is hard and the tendency is toward depression and discouragement. The moving picture theatre furnishes the most wholesome entertainment of the day. It is censored more severely than the regular theatre or books. What could the Christian public ask for more than a paid official should guard these theatres?" The clergyman concluded by saying that he was a patron of the moving pictures himself and takes "personal delight" in them.

After all is said and done, we are of the opinion that it is the broad-minded clergy of this country, and not the newspapers, who are accountable for the magnificent change of sentiment anent the pictures. Ministers are lauding the moving pictures from the pulpit; they are utilizing their churches for moving picture entertainments of dignified and instructive character; and thus they are giving the pictures added uplift and also educating their congregations to a love of the picture screen. We have several excellent writers on moving picture subjects from among the ministerial brethren, also. The broad-minded clergyman has perceived the power for good that lies in the moving picture. He proposes to utilize that good and in so doing, wields a great power to counteract the influences in the industry that we should all like to see eliminated—influences that the Moving Picture News has been fearlessly combating for many years. A large number of pastors subscribe for this publication and the list is growing. It is a happy sign. A majority of the clergymen are being won to the defense of the moving picture and the power of the clergy in this country is not to be decried.

We had intended to say no more on the subject of inaccurate historical pictures, believing that our previous admonitions were severe enough. However, those having the advancement of the art at heart have read with chagrin, yes, with feelings of humiliation, the criticisms directed at certain "historical" films that have been released with a great fanfare of press agent trumpeting within the past few weeks. Particularly are certain of the supposed "historically correct" Civil War pictures being scored in G. A. R. and other patriotic circles. The blunders pointed out and ridiculed to the detriment of the entire industry, are not small blunders that "might have happened anyway." No; the inaccuracies have resulted from everyday carelessness and, worse yet, ignorance of historic detail. There are many famous commanders yet living who participated in many of the more noted battles of the Civil War. Both North and South have students of Civil War history and those students were living actors on the fields of carnage. A brigadier general who fought in several of the historic battlefields of the South sat near me during the showing of a spectacular picture and picked holes in the Civil War play. He pointed out the Studebaker and spring wagons so numerous; laughed at the Union soldiers rushing into battle with fixed bayonets and blankets, haversacks, belts and other camp accouterments strapped on their backs; and even the battlefield, according to this commander and other war veterans in the audience, was anything but "just as good." General Robert E. Lee, according to the history of that great commander written by his son (the history can be found in any library), was slender, erect and tall. Yet the actor taking the part of Lee in this particular picture was short and stout. Lincoln was depicted as wearing a shawl on November 19, 1863, when he made his memorable address. But the worst shock came when the picture had the date of the address labeled "November 29, 1865," full seven months after Lincoln had been laid in his tomb at Springfield, Ill. These and many other blunders were pointed out and there is no excuse for them. Historical releases must be prepared studiously and carefully. We advocate a well-filled historical library for some writers and directors who seem to think that the depicting of several hundred charging soldiers and much powder smoke will condone for inaccurate historical dates and historical license. Historical pictures, so called, mitigate against the welfare of the entire industry. Congress will never store historical moving pictures until the doubt of their accuracy is removed. Critics are learning to visit the "historical picture" in fear and trembling. Honest oversights can be excused, but in this day and age of intelligent audiences, an effort should be made to consult historical authorities before producing "historical" films. Many a historical picture released is perfect in every detail. But there are others released that excite ridicule and detract in the minds of the people from the careful historical release that has gone before.

A clerk in the French Chamber of Deputies reasoned that moving pictures taken during important debates would stimulate pride and patriotism throughout France. On his own responsibility he gave permission to the camera men to enter the legislative hall. The machine was installed and ran some time before the deputies knew anything about it. Only fifteen were in their seats and some were even snoring away the dull hours. When the news got around there was a remarkable change. The bar was deserted and there was some fine gesticulation and much business transacted. It is suggested that President Wilson install moving picture machines in the U. S. Senate. Then, maybe, the statesmen will get down to business and do something for a suffering country.

RELIANCE ARRANGES AN ARTISTIC PROGRAM FOR THE EXPOSITION

Three reels of the nine advance releases to be presented at the Exposition by Manager J. V. Ritchey, of the Reliance Company, were selected by him as being absolutely the latest word in pictureplay producing from an artistic standpoint.

"Ashes," a two-reel subject, scheduled for regular release on July 12, will be shown at the Exposition as will also the single-reel subject "Her Rosary." Every scene of "Ashes" is viewed upon the screen surrounded by a bouquet of flowers. The border changes from violets to sweetpeas, American beauties, lilies of the valley and orchids, the two reels being double exposure scenes throughout.

"Her Rosary," another reel chosen for its artistic value, presents the beautiful lines of the famous song illustrated by scenes of an original story. Not only is every scene dissolved into the following scene but the subtitles are also treated in the same manner. Both pictures are the work of Oscar C. Apfel, with Irving Cummings, Rosemary Theby, Edgena de Lespine, Norma Phillips, Irene Howley, and Bobbie Robbins prominent in the casts.

LOIS WEBER WILL BE MAYOR OF UNIVERSAL CITY

Universal City is to have a woman mayor—Miss Lois Weber, the only woman motion picture director in the world. A. M. Kennedy, former manager of the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal Film Company was elected mayor of Universal City recently. A few days ago he resigned and left for Calgary, Canada, leaving the world's only city devoted exclusively to the making of picture films without a mayor. The council, at its regular meeting next week, will appoint Miss Weber to fill the vacancy. At the municipal election she was defeated for mayor by Mr. Kennedy by only fifteen votes.

Miss Weber, in private life Mrs. Philips Smalley, ranks at the very top of cleaver and interesting women in picture plays. That which attracts to her the regard of the public chiefly is that her work is dominated by one purpose—moral uplift—for which screen stories provide such a splendid outlet.

For two years Miss Weber was a church army worker in Pittsburgh. There she went into the slums, carrying cheer to the lowly and unfortunate. Miss Weber is famous as a singer, and lent her beautiful voice to the street meetings of the church army workers. From Pittsburgh she went to New York as a home missionary and worked for some months in the slum districts and among the prisoners and the blind on Blackwells Island.

Miss Weber was asked as to her policies when she becomes mayor of Universal City, and she said:

"I cannot go into detail until I have taken my office, but I can say that cleanliness in municipal rule and cleanliness in picture making will be the basis of my endeavors."

THE FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, GETTYSBURG, PA.

Lubin Release of July 8th.

For pictorial, educational and entertainment purposes this film is eminent. On the fiftieth anniversary of the greatest battle in American history (July 1, 2 and 3) thousands of veterans of both Union and Conferedate armies assembled in grand reunion upon the field where fifty years before they had waged deadly war. Views of Little Round Top, Bloody Angle, Devil's Den, Seminary Ridge and other points of interest are shown. Yank and Reb wander hand in hand over the battlefield recalling their parts in the great struggle, shaking hands and crossing flags over the old Stone Wall—the same wall over which they once glared hatred through the smoke of the big guns. They stop to rest, leaning against silent cannons and swap reminiscences. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, Governors and many other notables of the present day who attended the reunion have also been photographed.

The field hospital, the Boy Scouts, the Pennsylvania State Constabulary and other organizations on hand to guard the health and comfort of the veterans have also been incorporated. Altogether it is a film worth seeing and one which will be preserved for all time for its historical value.

At the Monarch studios at Hollywood, the general manager, Tom Evans, has added another stage, 70 by 70 feet this time. The big sets constantly being used precluded the placing of another set whilst the two present stages were occupied and the addition is a very necessary one for the company. New scenic docks have also been added.

It was ladies' night at the Photoplayers Club on Saturday and there was a large and brilliant gathering. Dancing and a vaudeville entertainment filled the night in well. The oldest pictureplay actor, Charles Manley, was there as was also one of the youngest, Master Matty, both of them appearing in the Monarch films. Mr. Manley was as spry as anyone there. You cannot make him believe he is of any age at all and the actors and actresses at the Monarch studious have to absolutely bully him to make him get out of the hot sun. He is certainly a well beloved old gentleman.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Anderson & Haupt have completed plans and the owner, H. Berman, is taking bids for a moving picture theatre to be erected at 2029 South Third street.

Philadelphia, Pa.—The Plaza, at Broad and Porter streets, has opened for business. It is under the management of John H. Love.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Carl P. Berger is preparing plans for alterations to the First Baptist Church building, to be converted into a moving picture theatre. Stiefel Amusement Company, owners.

Petoskey, Mich.—A contract has been let for the erection of a new theatre here, the Temple, which will be erected by Mr. and Mrs. Walter Chrysler, and will be completed July 15th. Norman Feldman will be manager.

DICK'S TURNING

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Reliance Release.)

DICK was not yet twenty-one and Millie only sixteen when they were married. Their friends and Millie's parents tried to persuade them to wait a few years, but Dick said he had no home, that he and Millie loved each other and he was able to support her, so he didn't see any reason why they should wait.

The boy had a good job at the mills and they were able to live very comfortably in a bedroom, a parlor and a kitchen, and save a few dollars each week. They were as happy and prosperous as they had dreamed of being, and who could ask for better than that?

For six months all went well. Then the strike came. Like the other mill workers they lived on what they had saved, as long as they could. But the rent had to be paid and they had to eat something. Then the payments on the furniture had to be made.

It is a terribly distressing thing to buy furniture on the instalment plan and not be able to make the last payments. You buy just the kind that suits you. That makes it yours from the beginning. Then you become fonder and fonder of it as the months pass, until it is like an old friend. Bad luck comes, and then, one day, some big, coarse men, who seem to have no right whatever in your house, come in and take away all the things you have become fond of.

Just this happened to Dick and Millie, only their distress was drawn out. For they had bought their things at different places, and they kept up the payments of the most necessary as long as they could possibly manage.

The day the bedroom furniture was taken Millie broke down and cried. "Never mind, little girl," comforted Dick, "I can be very comfortable here on the floor and you can go to your mother's for a while. We have the rent paid only for another week. Something is sure to turn up soon for me. Won't you go, dear?"

"No, Dick," she sobbed, "I won't leave you. If you can sleep on the floor so can I. I'm not going to leave you."

All Dick's persuasion was of no avail. Together they made their bed on the floor with the few coverings.

For another week they managed to get along. Every day the young man went out to look for work, but the result was always the same. One day he came in quietly after a long, disappointing tramp, and found Millie sitting by the window of the almost bare kitchen. Her face was relaxed, and for a moment, before she heard him, Dick caught a glimpse of her as she really was. At sight of him her face brightened, and but for that moment of unconsciousness she would have been still able to keep him in ignorance of her true condition.

"They've taken the stove and everything," she said sadly, before he had a chance to speak.

Dick gathered her in her arms and turned her face up so that he might see it. He was shocked to see how thin and pale she was. "Yes, I see they have, but I see something else, sweetheart, that I've been too blind to see before. I see a little wife with a pale, thin face and big eyes with black circles under them. You are not getting proper food. Now that the stove is gone you will have even less than before that you should have. Besides, we can't pay the rent again."

Millie clung to him, for she knew what was coming.

"You will go now, won't you, Millie?"

No answer.

"If you love me you will keep yourself in good health so I won't worry about you. You can't be in good health unless you have enough to eat and the right kind of things. Won't you go, dear little girlie?"

Millie choked back a sob. "Yes, I'll go. I have to when you talk like that."

So the next morning Dick took her to her parents' home to stay until he could find work. When they were nearly there Millie stopped. "I can't go without you, Dick," she said. "I just can't. Promise me you will stay too. Please, please," she ended.

Dick weakened a little. "Well, we'll see how I'm received. If both your parents ask I might stay. But you know they don't like me very well for taking you away from them."

"I know," acknowledged Millie, "but maybe they will ask you."

The mother came to the door to meet them. "I'm glad you've come, child, she said, "you look as though you need a good square meal. Come in, both of you. You can stay, Dick, as far as I'm concerned."

Just then Millie's father heard the conversation and came into the room. "Well, not as far as I'm concerned," he growled. "You stay here, Millie, and your loafer of a husband can go where he pleases. There's no room for him under my roof."

Fire flashed in Millie's eyes. "Do you think I'll stay here without him? Dick's no loafer. He worked hard till the strike came, and he's been looking for work since. Where there's no room for him there's no room for me. Come on, Dick."

She turned toward the door, but Dick stopped her. "No, Millie," he said gently, "you stay here anyway. If you want to please me that is the thing to do. It will be much easier for me, and I'm sure you don't want to make things any harder than necessary. I'll be back for you soon, I'm sure."

Millie put her arms around his neck. "I love you, Dick," she whispered, "and I'll do anything now that will make things easier for you. I see what a struggle you've had."

Dick held her close for a moment. "Good-bye, Mrs. Allen," he said, without so much as a glance at her husband.

Then Dick went to the park to think. He had no home and scarcely any money, so where else could he go?

As he sat thinking, hour after hour he was in a worse and worse condition of mind. He had been seeking work until he was worn out with disappointment. Every hope seemed to fail. Now, at least, he had a moment to relax since Millie was safe. He relaxed his body but his mind remained tense. He could not forget what Mr. Allen had said. He had called him a loafer. All the bitterness in Dick's nature rose up in him now. "Well," he thought, "if I'm thought to be a loafer why not be one for a while? Millie's well taken care of and the good weather's coming on; why shouldn't I strike the road?"

Dick put his hands behind his head and looked up at the leafy branches. "It would be good to get into the country," he thought. "I'll do it," and he slapped his knee.

His hand touched something soft. Well, you little rascal," he said to a tiny kitten beside him. "Where did you come from?"

The kitten did not give any information as to its origin, but it made it very plain that it wished to be adopted.

"How Millie would love it," he thought. "It would keep her from grieving for me so much."

Dick was soon on his way to take Millie the kitten. He put it in his pocket, but being of an investigating turn of mind it insisted upon putting its head out to see what was going on.

Suddenly a dog spied the little furry head and made a jump for it. But the kitten was too quick for him. Out of Dick's pocket it sprang and ran to the top of a fence surrounding a courtyard.

For a moment Dick hesitated, but his desire for Millie to have the kitten overcame his objections to entering other people's property, and he went inside the yard.

As he was nearing the kitten he suddenly felt a queer, stinging blow behind his ear. Then all was darkness.

When he opened his eyes he found himself lying upon a large, handsomely dressed bed in a room furnished in a style beyond anything Dick had ever seen. He thought he was dreaming.

"Are you better?"

Dick turned his head in the direction of the soft voice. A lady bent over him. "I am so glad to see you better," she almost sobbed. "I have been so anxiously waiting for you to open your eyes."

"Why, what has happened to me? I thought I was dreaming. How did I get here? Oh, I remember something hitting me, but I didn't know what it was. And the kitten! What became of it?"

"The kitten is all right," the lady told him. "It was my little boy who hurt you. He had a new air-gun, and not realizing that it could really do any harm, he aimed it at the kitten. He hit you instead and stunned you, and then you fell and hit your head. The doctor said you would be all right in a little while, but I have been so anxious about you."

"Thank you for your kindness. I think I'll go now."

"No; the doctor said you must be quiet for a day or two. I'll call my husband's valet and he can put you to bed. Was the kitten yours?" asked the lady.

"Yes. It came to me in the park and I was taking it to my wife. I must go now, for she will be so glad to get the kitten."

"Why, you're not married!" exclaimed the lady. "You look just like a boy."

Dick smiled. "I'm not twenty-one yet, but I've been married over six months."

"And you live with your wife's people?"

"No; we kept house, but the strike cut me out of work and we've had a pretty hard time. Millie just went to her mother's to-day. She'll be lonesome without me, so I thought I'd take her the kitten for company."

"Won't you tell me all about yourself?" urged the lady. "I am interested in you and would like to help you if I could in any way. Suppose you let me send for Millie, and then you can talk to her, and she will know you are all right here for a day or two."

Dick consented to write a short note telling Millie he had met with a slight accident and was being cared for at a certain address.

"Is the kitten safe?" he asked, when the note was written.

"It is in the kitchen and has plenty to eat," he was assured.

While they were waiting for Millie Dick was made comfortable in bed, and then the lady came in to sit by him.

Dick was soon telling her his whole history: how he had been left an orphan at twelve years and had gone to work in the mills; how he had worked his way up, studying what he could at night, until he got into a position which enabled him to get married. Then he told her of the objections of Millie's parents, of the happiness of their six months of married life, and the terrible trouble the strike had brought upon them.

The lady listened attentively and much of the time with tears in her eyes. "It is too bad," she said, "too bad that some people should have so much and some so little. What kind of work can you do beside what you did at the mill?"

"Well, I don't want to boast," laughed Dick, "but I can turn my hand to 'most anything. And I'm willing to learn if I don't know how."

In an hour Millie was by her husband's bedside. "What has happened to you, sweetheart?" she asked anxiously, after she had kissed him.

"I'll tell you just how it was," began Dick. "After leaving you I went to the park and sat there for a long time. I kept remembering that your father called me a loafer. The thought came to me that I might as well be a loafer if I was thought one. I confess, girlie, that for the time it seemed to me it would be lovely just to be a tramp. I knew you were safe, and I had just about made up my mind to strike the road for a while. And then what do you think happened? I felt a fuzzy little kitten right against my knee. Of course I thought of you, and I thought it would keep you company. As I was bringing it along the street a dog scared it and away it went over a big fence. I went through the gate to get it, and before I could get it from the fence something struck me and I didn't know any more. The lady says her little boy had an air-gun and didn't know it could hurt so much. He was aiming at the kitten."

"And he hit you, my poor darling," murmured Millie close to his ear, her arms tight around him.

Just then the lady came into the room again. "I have been talking to my husband," she told Dick, "and we have a plan. How would you like to be a chauffeur?"

Dick looked at her in surprise and said: "Why, I guess I'd like it all right, but I'd have to learn, wouldn't I, and get a license? I haven't any money."

"That will be all right," the lady reassured him. "This is our plan. We need a chauffeur just now. We are willing to pay you twenty-five dollars a week while you are learning and pay the expenses connected with the lessons. When you are proficient we will pay you fifty dollars a week. Will that be satisfactory?"

Dick and Millie were both staring in wide-eyed astonishment. "I think it will," exclaimed Dick. "And then this little girl and I can go to housekeeping again."

"Yes," answered Millie through her tears, "and the kitten can have a fine collar and a silk cushion, for she brought it all about."

"TOM BLAKE'S REDEMPTION"

(American Release, July 24)

A story replete with pathos, excitement and joy. Tom Blake, the only son of a widow, gives way to the demon of drink and his promising career seems doomed to dismal failure. The pride of a widow's life seems to be dashed into a yawning abyss of despair. The joy of love's young dream is to give way to bitter disappointment. But a kind fate has willed it otherwise and an insignificant incident turns the tide. The spark of manhood is fanned to a glowing flame. The mother's unfaltering confidence in her only son is to be rewarded with a realization of her fondest expectation. The dream of a trusting maiden is to become a reality.

Tom has become master of himself and as the architect of his own future he proceeds to blast away the obstructions of unreliability, intemperance, cowardice, indifference and all the other negative qualities that stand between a man and his realization of life's happiness and success.

Warren Kerrigan gives a splendid dramatization of Tom Blake. Many scenes are exceptionally thrilling and the interest is beautifully maintained throughout the film. The photography is stereoscopic with excellent judgment in the choice of settings.

The scenario was written by Maud Moore Clement and the subject was produced under the direction of Mr. A. W. Hale.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

While under the recent decision of the U. S. Supreme Court in the "Sanatogen" case the owner of a patent may no longer enforce restrictions imposed upon the use and resale of a patented article as against a party to whom such article is sold outright, even though such restrictions have been made known to such purchaser there is nothing therein contained to prevent the owner of a patent from imposing restrictions upon the use of the patent and the manufacture and sale of the patented articles by a licensee, and such restrictions, if part of an express agreement between the owner of the patent and said licensee, may unquestionably be enforced by such owner as against such licensee. Furthermore, as demonstrated, among other cases in the Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Laemmle, 178 Fed. 104 (C. C. S. D. New York, 1910), and the Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Ullman, 184 Fed. 174 (C. C. S. D. New York, 1910), even the fact that the owner of a patent is a combination, or a party to a combination, formed or existing for the purpose of monopolizing patents of the same general character, will not avail an infringer of such patent, who is not a licensee or party to such combination, as a defense to a suit for infringement brought by the owner of such patent. Similarly, the fact that the owner of a patent is a combination, or a party to a combination, formed or existing in violation of the Sherman Act, will not avail an infringer of such patent, who is not a licensee or party to such combination, as a defense to a suit for infringement brought by the owner of such patent. There are numerous other decisions that might be cited in support of these propositions. In other words the owner of a patent may do acts which, without the immunity of a patent, would clearly amount to a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

But, Oh! Death's untim'ly frost,
That ni'pt my flower sae early."

Dying prematurely at the age of thirty-five, Ernest Ruhmer left a record that many men of the proverbial three-score and ten might well be proud of. Among his numerous inventions is an instrument for photographically recording and acoustically reproducing sound waves with the aid of a selenium cell, a multiple microphone, a selenium photometer, a device for determining and registering the intensity of daylight, an arc-light interrupter, a television apparatus, and a system of light telephony in which selenium cells and searchlights were experimentally used with great success.

Gustave Cramer, of Chicago, Ill., has been granted registration No. 92,321 for "ALPHA" as a trade mark for sensitized photographic papers, claiming use since about the middle of February, 1911.

The figure is a plan of a combined kinetoscope and stereopticon embodying the invention of Alvah C. Roebuck, of Chicago, Ill. (Patent No. 1,064,010) which relates to projecting apparatus, especially to multiple dissolving view stereopticons, and has for its objects: To provide a simple, efficient construction adapted to refract light from a single source of illumination in a manner that the picture projected from each of the plurality of optical systems will appear on the same spot of the screen to insure proper registration, and with which economy in the operation of the equipment is attained by a decrease in the breakage of the lens when using illuminants of great strength. Also to provide a structural combination of parts whereby a double dissolving stereopticon, or a compound dissolving steropticon composed of two stereoscopic series, are illuminated with the same illuminant used in connection with a kinetoscopic projecting apparatus. 2 are longitudinal tracks, secured to base board 1 of the kinetoscope. 3 are secondary tracks arranged transversely to tracks 2, and capable of longitudinal adjustment thereon. 4 is the single lamp house mounted on tracks 3, and capable of transverse movement thereon. 5 is an illuminating apparatus. 6 is a kinetoscope secured to the forward end of base board. The carrying frame of the stereopticon objective 8, is secured by lateral extension 7 to the side of the kinetoscope. The optical center of the stereopticon objective 8 is arranged in a plane above the optical center of the kinetoscope 6, so that a clear space will be provided above said kinetoscope objective for the introduction and removal of the stereopticon slides. 9 is a condenser. 10 is a companion condenser. 11 are the inner group of lens members, and 12 the outer group of lens members. The inner group of lens members 11 comprise a planospherical lens member formed in two sections separated by a diametric gap 13. 35 is a vertical pedestal secured to the floor of the lamp house 4. 36 is a vertically adjustable head on pedestal 35 adapted to be secured thereto by a set-screw 37. 40 and 41 are the carbon carriers receiving adjusting movements by wheels 42 and 43 through any usual intermediate operative connections.

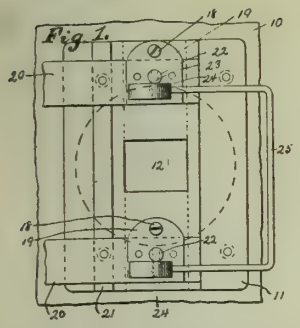
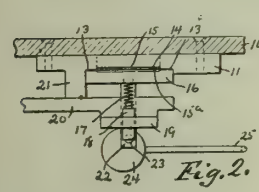
Mobile color or color harmonics, a new art invented (?) by Mr. A. Wallace Rimington, Professor of Fine Arts at Queen's College London, has been demonstrated by means of a curious instrument built for the purpose after years of experimental investigation, and called a "Color Organ," upon which the professor composes symphonies and sonatas in chromatic lights and shades. In the past others have noted certain analogies between sound and color, but it remained for Mr. Rimington to do the pioneer act—that is the conclusion to be drawn from a perusal of his book "Color Music" in which he expounds the theoretical side of the innovation. He sees no reason why a great color art analogous to the art of music should not come into vogue, "appealing to the emotions to an extent which it is difficult for those to realize who had not seen it." Both color and sound are vibratory in origin, and in Rimington's color organ the color octave of the spectrum is made to correspond with the octave of the musical scale, although the analogy in this respect "is relatively not of very much importance." One thing is certain however, as we all know from personal expert observation—that there are discords in color as well as in music. The organ has a regular keyboard and stops, and "plays" upon a white screen heavy in folds to give depth and life to the colors; and the possible combinations and effects are of course practically infinite. Furthermore a musical accompaniment was found to harmonize in some cases; although we should be more inclined to think of the color scheme as the accompaniment. The nearest approach to color music in nature, Rimington says, is to be found in certain sunsets. And he might have added that you will never find any discord of color therein. We like his choice of the term "mobile" color. Whether the word has been adapted in Cinematography we know not, but "Mobile Pictures" seems more correct and euphonious than "Moving" or even "Motion Pictures" and is far more acceptable than "Movies."



The object of the invention set forth in Patent No. 1,064,252, issued to the Picturegraph Co., as assignee of Burton A. Proctor, of New York City, for moving picture machines, is to produce a film gate which is simple and inexpensive, is not likely to get out of order, which can be instantly adjusted to release or clamp the film, and which when in position to guide the film will hold it resiliently and yet in a manner to perfectly guide it. Another object of the invention is to construct the film gate so that it will be movable bodily in and out with relation to the film, thus rendering it unlikely to catch and bind the film. Figure 1 is an inside elevation of a portion of a moving picture machine and Fig. 2 is a sectional plan of the attachment. The body 10 of the machine has a plate 11 which serves as a support for the gate attachments and which has the opening 12 through which the picture from the film is projected. The plate 11 is provided with a way 13 which extends in a vertical direction across plate 11 so as to traverse the light opening and the lack of the way is relieved in the center 15, this part coming opposite the picture portion of the film and being the same width as the light opening 12, while the side edges of the film are held on the side portions of the way 13, The gate 16 is in the form of a plain plate which fits snugly and which is movable in and out with relation to the plate 11. The gate 16 is relieved in the center as shown at 15a, so that there will be no possible friction or contact on the picture portion of the film 14 while the edges of the latter are held securely, smoothly, and yet resiliently between the side portions of the gate 16 and the way 13. The gate 16 is open in the center to correspond with the aperture 12 of the plate 11, and is longer than the aperture so as to exert uninterrupted pressure on the side portions of the film, thus holding the film straight and flat. The gate 16 is pressed gently against the film 14 by light springs 17, to adjusting screws 18, turning in lugs 19 attached to plates 20, and the latter are secured to a lug 21 on the back of the plate 11. The plate is provided with posts 22 which connect by journals 23 with cams 24, circular in shape which ride on the ears 19 which serve as abutments for the cams connected by a bail-like handle 25.



As "Life" sees it. A recent decision of the Supreme Court in patent cases is to the effect that a dealer can sell articles which he buys at wholesale at any price he chooses, regardless of a rule laid down by the wholesaler. In other words, a firm which manufactures an article cannot fix a price upon it for the open market. Any dealer who desires to cut the price, even though he loses money by the operation, can do it if he wants to. There have been instances where retailers have cut the price of articles for purposes of advertising.

This is admirable; but what we really want is a decision which will prevent people from selling an article for twice or three times what it is worth. We can stand it very well to buy things below cost, but if the law works one way why not have it work the other?"

Pat—That I do not. The last time I was up before his honor he sez: "I recall that face. Sixty days." Am ag'in' the recall of judges.—Life.

UNIVERSAL JOTTINGS

One of the most practical tests of the value of the Boy Scout movement in America is being made this week by the young hopefuls, in the Washington to Chicago relay race. The Animated Weekly of the current week will show the start of the epoch-making event in juvenile sporting annals, having filmed the scene wherein President Wilson delivered to Fred Reed the message that the boys will carry over the intervening 775.4 miles to Mayor Carter Harrison, of Chicago.

The start took place at 9.30 o'clock and was witnessed by Secretary Lane of the Department of the Interior, Representatives Britten and McAndrews, of Illinois; Colin H. Livingstone, president of the Boy Scouts of America; members of the White House clerical force and a large number of sightseers.

The largest motion picture stage in the world, which far eclipses in size that upon which the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau is staged, has recently been completed for the Universal West Coast Organization. To properly dedicate it, five hundred of the Universal force and their friends congregated on the evening of June 19 at the Hollywood studios, and under the direction of Mr. Joseph W. Engel, made merry in one of the largest "rag" parties of the season. The big stage was draped with bunting, among which were suspended scores of Japanese lanterns. The Hollywood band of sixteen pieces provided music.

It was an informal happy gathering and dress suits were relegated to the camphor and white flannels and dainty lingerie gowns were much in evidence.

Joseph Edward Victor Fairfield Daveran Singleton, the big Australian, is one of the parties, and Miss Iva Shepard is the other to a charming romance that has unfolded through their joint work in a series of Universal pictures. The blushing Joseph recently announced his forthcoming marriage to Miss Shepard and the event is expected to occur in the near future.

J. V. RITCHEY MAKES BIG CLAIMS FOR "HER ROSARY"

Manager J. V. Ritchey, of the Reliance, is not a man who enthuses very easily, and is seldom heard to make any extravagant statements about the output of his own studios. In view of this fact his remarks regarding "Her Rosary," to be released on July 16, are worthy of attention. "Of course I have not seen every picture that has been produced, but both as an exhibitor and a manufacturer I have made it my business to see a large number of them and I can safely say that I consider 'Her Rosary' the most artistic single-reel subject I have ever had the pleasure of looking at. Of course it is what might be called a 'fancy' picture. All the sentiment of the poem is greatly in its favor, all of which goes toward giving it the artistic finish which we so admire in a picture."

HARRY K. HECHT BUILDING NEW THEATRE AT PASSAIC, N. J.

The Garden Theatre, Passaic, N. J., is the latest addition to the motion picture houses in that town. It is located in the busiest spot in Passaic, and Mr. Hecht, the proprietor, having several theatres at the present time, is furnishing the new house with the most up-to-date equipment. Through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," will be installed a Powers No. 6A machine complete, with Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer to deliver up to 60 amperes D. C., lobby decorative effects, ticket receiver and full line of supplies. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of two Powers No. 6 machines with two Hallberg Standard A. C. Economizers to the Paradise Garden Theatre, Hunter, N. Y.

Mr. Charles Urban has secured universal rights to reproduce in Kinemacolor Maeterlinck's sacred drama, "Mary Magdalene," and will shortly commence filming it in Paris. Madame Maeterlinck will sustain the important title role, in which she has previously appeared with distinction. It is hoped that the production will be ready for presentation in London, at existing Kinemacolor houses and an additional theatre, yet to be taken, in the early Autumn. Mr. Urban has also acquired rights with regard to the same author's remarkable play, "The Blue Bird."

HIS WEAKNESS CONQUERED (July 20).—Jack Hamilton, in childhood, is afraid of snakes. His mother humors his weakness until he arrives at a point where anything resembling a serpent throws him into a frenzy.

Twenty years later he becomes a prosperous business man, but his fear has grown with him until it has almost assumed the proportions of insanity. A friend calls at Jack's office, wearing a snake scarf pin. Jack becomes frantic, until the friend removes the pin.

Jack is in love with Mary Charleson, a charming young widow, who has a little daughter. This love is returned, but she fears for his health, and tells him she cannot marry him until he has conquered his weakness. Mrs. Hamilton entertains some guests at a week-end house party at her hunting lodge. Mary purchases a snake ring for Jack as a birthday gift while there, and the effect upon him when she presents it alarms her.

Mary's little daughter is given a Chinese paper snake and thinks it will be a great joke to frighten Jack with it while he is reading a book. The child sneaks up on him and drops the snake over the book Jack is reading. Jack, in a frenzy at sight of the snake, strikes at it with a heavy paper cutter and hits the child on the head, felling her to the floor. Crazed by his act, he rushes from the house and flees into the woods.

The child is attended to and the guests start in search of Jack. They find him late that night on the verge of insanity, and bring him back to the lodge.

Later, a friend suggests a cure by auto-suggestion. He makes Jack place his hand over his, telling him he holds a snake. Jack cowers and trembles, but the friend suggests that Jack let his mind be guided by his. When the friend opens his hand, he holds a watch and Jack is brought to a realization of the folly of superstition and imagination. The child is brought into the room, carrying a snake. Jack looks at the snake and then takes it from the child.

Mary and Jack go hunting the next day. While Jack is out after game, Mary rests and falls asleep. Jack returns to her and sees a snake dropping down from the tree above her. He rushes up and kills the snake, proving his complete cure. Mary, realizing his fear has been conquered, agrees to marry him, and they return to the hunting lodge a happy couple.

HER NERVE (July 17).—Violet Horner, the relief operator, arrives at Lonesome Valley station. Upon alighting from the train she is met by the express agent, who is smitten with her charms. He takes her in and introduces her to the other operator, whom she is to relieve.

The two operators become good friends and practically ignore the agent, who, angered at this, at his first opportunity insults the girl, for which he is knocked down by Barrows, the other operator. He is later discharged.

The shipment of money arrives for a mine nearby. The agent contrives to open the safe and get this. Violet catches him in the act. While he is at work on the safe, Barrows, who is in the other room, gets a wire to the effect that the bridge at Mars Creek is burning and to stop train 44. The agent hears this, rushes into the telegraph room, knocks Barrows down and ties him.

Violet climbs in the window, takes the box containing the money, jumps out of the window and is seen by the agent, who chases her. There is a long chase in a motor boat and a wild automobile ride. Violet arrives in time to save the train, while the agent, in making a sharp turn in the road, is thrown from the auto and killed.

Violet returns to the station, receives congratulations and promotion from headquarters.

COOKING FOR TROUBLE (July 16).—John's breakfast is late on account of a flirtation between the cook and the iceman. John is angry, and the cook leaves in a huff. John goes to business without his breakfast, while John's wife decides to try her hand at preparing lunch. After a morning's work, consisting of cigars and sweet repose, John goes home for lunch and finds what appears to be a delightful looking meal, cooked by his wife. Appearances, however, are deceptive, and John does not appreciate the novelty of safety pins in his soup nor chicken that requires the use of a steam saw, and the result is "a quarrel with Mary," who decides to go home to mother, and John returns to the office for the rest of the day.

Mary misses her train, returns home, and angrily locks herself in her room. John comes home late in the evening, finds the house apparently empty, and decides to cook himself a little supper, and he has some remarkable experiences. Among other things, he forgets to turn off the faucet in the kitchen sink, and the result is when he goes to bed the kitchen is flooded and the cook, who returns late at night, after her huff had worn off and, finding the door locked, decides to enter through the kitchen window, whereupon she concludes there has been a flood. After much aquatics she is finally rescued from the depths of the kitchen ocean by John, and forgiven after promising never to flirt with the iceman before meals.

THE INTRUDER (July 18).—Bob Craig, a woodsman, while out hunting one day, stumbles over the body of Preston Crandall, a rich man from the East, who had sprained his ankle while gunning. Craig takes him to his cabin and with the help of his wife nurses Crandall back to health. Crandall becomes infatuated with Craig's comely-looking wife and takes advantage of Craig's absence on hunting trips to show his love for her. As it nears the day for his departure, he tries to induce Mrs. Craig to flee with him, telling her of the great mansions, automobiles, and servants which he can offer her, and which her husband cannot, but she steadfastly refuses. At last Crandall leaves, bidding them good-bye and Craig leaves on his day's hunt. Crandall returns and makes a desperate appeal to Mrs. Craig. The rich man overwhelms her with promises, and at last she consents to leave with him, taking her infant girl, Elsie, with her, much against Crandall's wishes. On his return, Craig finds the note written to him by his wife, telling of her love for Crandall. He can hardly believe that his wife has been false, and after the first shock is over, he turns to drink for consolation.

Several years pass and we find Mrs. Craig leading an unhappy life in the home of Crandall in the East. His love had worn off soon after their elopement. One night Crandall is particularly abusive to Mrs. Craig, and is suddenly called away on an important errand, leaving Mrs. Craig and little Elsie, now five years old, alone in the house. That night a burglar breaks in and Mrs. Craig bravely goes downstairs to investigate. She captures the burglar, who turns out to be Bob Craig, her husband, who had gradually drifted down the ladder after his wife's treachery. Craig by a ruse gains possession of her revolver, and after telling of her treachery, etc., prepares to shoot her in revenge, when little Elsie appears in the room, clad in her nightgown. Elsie's appeal saves her mother's life. Crandall arrives and covers Craig with a revolver. Mrs. Craig, pretending allegiance to Crandall, gets possession of his revolver and frees Craig. He attempts to 'phone for the police, but Elsie cuts the wires. She begs Craig's forgiveness and receives it, and he leaves, taking his wife and child with him, leaving Crandall fuming at his helplessness.

THE WILES OF CUPID (July 17).—As children they played together and no one interfered. But when she grew into a beautiful young woman and he became a man things began to change. He was the son of a widow and the "big brother" of two little sisters, and he had to work hard to keep the little home together. She was the daughter of a wealthy man who wanted still more wealth and that was the cause of all the trouble. Her father told her he wished her to marry the wealthy man. She told the boy about it and the two of them vowed they would have each other and no one else. At her request the wealthy man gave the boy a position in his office. But he didn't know the boy and the girl were lovers, and arrangements for his wedding with the girl went on. After a bitter struggle with himself the boy realizes the apparent hopelessness of his position and unselfishly he bids the girl obey her father. Piqued at what she considers his lack of spirit, the girl berates the boy and, in desperation, prepares to marry the rich man. In her wedding gown the girl steals from the big house and goes to the back fence where she and the boy used to play. She wants to see him just once more. She gives the old signal and the boy comes in answer. In her father's house the rich man and the guests are waiting to proceed with the ceremony. Strolling into the library the rich man looks out the window. He sees the boy and girl bidding each other a sad good-bye. He can't understand, so he goes to investigate. What he learns makes him scratch his grey head and think. But he's a good rich man, and decides quickly. The guests are astonished when the rich man, who they supposed was to be the groom, turns into a best man and leads the boy to the girl and insists that the clergyman pronounce them man and wife.

On his arrival at the mines he was waylaid by two of the men implicated in the frauds and left for dead on the roadside. There he is discovered by a little Indian girl, who, with the aid of her father, takes Lloyd to their cabin and nurses him back to life; but with returning consciousness all memory of the past has gone from his brain. Won by the sweetness of this little Indian maid, he woos and wins her.

Back in the East Agnes has discovered that Jackson is really the man she cared for, but she feels in honor bound to Lloyd. Jackson pleads with her, recalling Lloyd's long silence and offers to go West and see if he can find any trace of Lloyd. This Agnes consents to, and again we are on the wild plains of the West, where Lloyd lives with his little Indian wife and baby. There, in perfect happiness, Jackson finds them.

Gradually Lloyd's mind awakens to the memory of the past, and Jackson, in honor bound, pleads with him to go East. Lloyd hesitates, but seeing his little baby and dainty Indian wife, he sends Jackson back to the noise and bustle of the city, and remains in his humble home with those he loves. So two happy homes result.

MISSION BELLS (A Romance of San Juan Capistrano) (2 Reels).—One of the most beautiful pictures ever produced in Kinemacolor, comprising a series of scenes taken at the old San Juan Capistrano Mission with a decided touch of early Southern California.

After the day's labor the Mission fathers, returning from the fields, find a mother and a young child lying on the ground. The mother is dead, while the child lives. Francisco, taking the child in his arms, accompanied by Louis, returns to the Mission, while the other fathers bury the mother and offer prayers for the repose of her soul.

The baby grows up, and we see him eighteen years later ready for the holy orders to which Father Louis argues that he is destined, but Francisco advises the boy to go into the world and then make his choice. It was well suggested, for the boy had never seen the outside world, and fate leads him another way.

After a series of romantic adventures in the semi-Spanish society of the period, Pedro returns to the only parents he has ever known, to ask their permission to marry Senorita Isobel.

THE MASTER PAINTER (July 16).—With an ultimatum from his landlady to the effect that he must pay up or get out of his studio, Robert Gordon, a young artist, takes a few of his paintings and goes out to sell them. He is unsuccessful, all the dealers being overstocked. On his way home he saves an old man from death under an automobile.

The old gentleman is John Marshall, a master painter. He sees the paintings that Gordon is carrying and notices that he is evidently weak from starvation. In gratitude for what Gordon has done for him, Marshall asks him to come to his home and study under him, which offer is gladly accepted. At Marshall's house Gordon meets Marise, the master's niece, and before long falls in love with her.

Under Marshall's instruction Gordon progresses rapidly with his art and is soon engaged on important work. The master himself is occupied with a painting that he imagines will be the crowning effort of his life. Marshall's painting, however, is really unutterably bad, for the old man is rapidly losing his eyesight. When Marise and Gordon find that he thinks it a masterpiece and intends to enter it for the coming exhibition they are filled with pity for him but dare not tell him the truth.

Night after night Gordon works on the master's picture, determined, if it be possible, to save the master's reputation as an artist. One evening he is discovered by Marise, to whom he explains his actions.

Their constant association together has fanned the flame of love between Marise and Gordon and at last he goes to Marshall to ask for her hand. The old man is highly indignant and refuses to allow her to marry what he calls "an unknown artist." The night before the exhibition opens, Gordon puts the finishing touches on the picture, which is a really beautiful work of art and would have done credit to the master himself had it really been his work.

Just as Gordon lays down his brushes for the last time Marshall enters and sees him at work. Explanations cannot be avoided and so Marise tells him the truth about his painting.

Marshall is sadly disillusioned but generously acknowledges that Gordon is now the master and he the pupil. Placing the hands of Robert and Marise together, he fondly bestows upon them the blessing that he had before refused.

IN THE GARDEN (July 15).—Old Mr. Stevens finds a lover, at a dance, sulking because his sweetheart is kind to other men. To prevent two lives from being spoiled by misunderstanding, the old man tells the indignant swain the story of his own lost love.

In 1860, Stevens, a gallant young Southerner, was deeply in love with a girl, Julia. One evening, at a dance, the charming Julia seemed, to her jealous lover to be accepting too many attentions from the young beaux of the company. With a Southerner's characteristic impetuosity, Stevens bitterly reproached her for her fickleness, and turning on his heel left her.

That very night Stevens enlisted in a Confederate regiment. Next day, as the troops marched out of town, Julia stretched out her hands pleadingly to her stern lover, but he ignored her and left her without even a smile of farewell.

"Men must work while women weep." And so, while Stevens fought desperately for the South, Julia sat at home and stared wet-eyed across the hills—and waited.

We are not all made of the stern stuff that can wait and wait without hope, and that was why Julia grew paler as the days went by, why her blue eyes became deep somber wells of sadness.

And so it was that Stevens at last came home to find that he, like a better man, "threw a pearl away richer than all his tribe." For Julia wept no more. She was dead.

As the old man finishes his story the young man's sweetheart appears, radiant and lovable in her youth and beauty. It appears that it is the last dance, and she has saved it for her lover.

With a hesitating look at the poor old man the lover takes his sweetheart's hand and they go out together while old Mr. Stevens looks after them, sighs, and then turns away.

There is something of the old kindly sentiment our fathers loved in this quiet little drama. It makes a splendid picture, and one that well deserves success.

GRANNY'S OLD ARMCHAIR (July 18).—Granny Willard, seeing the end of her days approaching, begs to leave her bed and sit in her old armchair, the humble throne about which three generations have assembled. Her favorite grandson, Tom Willard, has come in from the farm with his buxom wife to visit. So the strong arms of youth carry old age gently to the armchair in the sunlit room for a last meeting with all her kith and kin. There came the rural types known to that modest old cottage, and then that more sacred circle of grandsons with their wives and little ones. So a lovely day passes, as do others, until the shadows darken and tears pay tribute to the passing of dear old granny. After the days of mourning, the family again meet to hear the last will and testament of the departed. All are remembered in substantial fashion, save the beloved grandson, Thomas, who must needs be content with Granny's old armchair. Other members of the family, visibly more fortunate, expect that Thomas, the poorest of them all, will attempt to break the will; but he accepts the legacy with love and gratitude. Fate, as if to further vex him, burns his house, but he, faithful to his trust, saves the rickety old chair. Part of the bottom is burned away, showing a note projecting from the upholstery. He investigates and finds it is upholstered with valuable securities, so, while he lost his house, he gained a fortune, and all his loving kindness was rewarded after all.

FROM OUT THE DEPTHS.—This story concerns the fortunes of a young English lass and her artisan husband, Jim Warren. Nellie Lee, loving, good-natured, pretty as a peach, and true as steel; Jim Warren, a bluff, hearty fellow of splendid instincts, but needing the "fires of fate" to temper his somewhat easy nature.

Briefly summarized, we have here a splendidly acted domestic drama, opening in the quiet little village of Elmhurst in rural Britain. Nellie is returning home, full of thoughts of her sweetheart. Lurking in the background is the sinister figure of Harry Foster, a kid-gloved crook, who follows Nellie down the rustic lane, accosts her, forces upon the girl his unwelcome attentions, and attempts to steal a kiss. Foster's voluptuous dreams are rudely shattered by Jim Warren's burly fist coming in violent contact with his face, and the discomfited "masher" hurls curses at the couple as they lovingly wander towards Nellie's home.

Next we are introduced to the simple marriage of the lovers, Foster frowning his maledictions at the church door. Time passes. Nellie and Jim are in their tiny London house. Jim is working and has made himself popular with his mates. The local bar has many attractions and Jim forgets the lonely little girl at home in the allurement of the saloon. But Nellie is a staunch little wife and will not acquiesce in Jim's methods, so takes a trip to the "Green Dragon" and asks Jim to come home. He immediately agrees, but, taunted by his chums with being tied to his wife's apron strings, Jim persuades Nell to go home alone—he will stay for one more glass. Alas, the weak nature prevails, and hours afterward Jim staggers home intoxicated. His befuddled brain misconstrues Nellie's loving actions into an attempt at "bossing the show." Shall a British workingman be dictated to by a woman? No! Off again to the saloon for him! "No, Jim; no dear," she cries, and guards the door. He, a great husky laborer, forgetting his brute strength, forgetting all his love, forgetting Nell's weakness, seizes her roughly and hurls her from him. Poor Nellie's head strikes the stone floor and she lies motionless. Suddenly sobered, Jim kneels by the inanimate form and, with growing horror, imagines he has killed the girl he has sworn to love, honor and cherish. Frantic with terror and remorse, he rushes out of the house and jumps the nearest train to flee from the scene. Wandering around the countryside, hunger at last impels him to steal a loaf of bread, but summary justice is dealt out and Jim is sentenced to jail.

Meanwhile, Nellie recovers from her severe blow, but the continued absence of Jim necessitates the selling of the furniture for rent, and she obtains a situation as maid in a country mansion.

When Jim comes out of prison, he meets the kid-gloved crook, who puts a proposition to him which, in his half-starved condition, he reluctantly accepts. The proposition is to burgle the house of Lord Everdale, which they learn will be left practically alone one night in the care of an old butler and two maids. In the dead of night, Jim effects an entrance and cautiously proceeds towards the library safe where Lady Everdale's valuable jewelry is kept. But he has been heard! Who is this sadly-pretty woman awakened from her rest, who sits up in bed and listens? None other than Jim's own wife, who had obtained employment at the Everdale establishment some weeks after Jim had deserted her. Hastily throwing a robe around her, Nellie creeps down the stairs and into the library, sees the broad back of a yeggman busily intent on breaking open a safe. She catches up a revolver and, calling to the cracksman, demands his surrender. He turns quickly —and they recognize one another! There is little time for explanations, but Jim falls at her feet, thankful for having been saved from staining his hands with crime. A swift embrace and he rushes out of the house just as the old butler comes along to investigate. Outside of the mansion he tells Foster that he is done with him forever, and shows his determination in no uncertain manner.

Two days later Nellie is overjoyed to receive a letter from him in which he confirms his intention to lead an honest life in the future, and states that he is on the track of a good job.

We next see Jim passing the door of the fateful saloon where his first downward step was taken, and going straight home with his pay envelope unopened. This bright, cheerful home is a great contrast to the former poor habitation, and when Jim reads in the paper that Foster at last has been tracked down and sentenced to five years of hard labor, he exclaims in great thankfulness, "But for the grace of God that would have been my fate!" We leave the reunited couple locked in a loving embrace.

JEALOUSY'S TRAIL (July 21).—The miner, Jim Moore, finding his claim does not yield paying results, goes in search of a new claim. His old claim is taken by a newcomer, Jack Larkin who, by more diligent methods, secures better results. Mrs. Moore does the weekly washing for Larkin and is paid for her labor in ore. Moore returns to his home and is beset with jealousy. The young miner, Larkin, offers to go into partnership with Moore, but is repulsed. The success of Larkin rankles Moore, and he becomes sullen and morose, harboring distrust against his innocent wife. In a jealous rage he attacks her with fatal results.

A neighbor, Louis Roland, who, in his kindly manner has been wont to comfort the unfortunate woman in her troubles, comes upon the handiwork of the jealous husband and the shock bereaves him of his reason. Young Larkin next leaves with the news and reports it to the sheriff. The neighbor's pipe found on the premises threw suspicion on him and a posse find him wandering in the forests, bereft of reason and unable to throw light on the situation. A chance circumstance enables Larkin to solve the apparent mystery and bring the guilty husband to justice.

SHE WILL NEVER KNOW (July 26).—The old adage of "Be sure your sin will find you out" is well exemplified in this drama of the life of Gracia Snow, whose father in his effort to acquire wealth becomes an incendiary. His crime is detected—he deserts his child and leaves for parts unknown. A guilty conscience gives him no rest and he becomes a knight of the road.

In later years he comes back to his old home under adverse circumstances. His identity becomes known, through a misdeed, but only to the lover of his daughter. Pride will not permit him to face the girl he forsook in her infancy, and he continues his aimless wanderings.

The news of the father's return was the basis of a surprise for the daughter, but when the lover finds the man has again left he keeps the secret to himself and the already disgraced daughter never knew to what depths her wayward father had fallen.

RELIANCE

THE FISHERMAN'S FORTUNE (July 14).—Ned Duncan, a worthless young fisherman, is in love with his cousin, Lucy Duncan. But Lucy's father, knowing well his nephew's evil tendencies, objects to his attentions. A quarrel ensues. His heart full of hatred and revenge, Ned makes his way to the water's edge, where he meets three shady looking strangers landing from a fishing smack. "Where is the nearest tavern?" Ned willingly agrees to show them and is invited in. Good fortune is at hand for Ned in the shape of a Westerner, who is directed to the hut of Ben Duncan, for whom he carries a letter from his brother asking him to assist the bearer, a trusted friend, in locating his son, Ned, now grown up to manhood—and handing over to him all the deceased's goods, amounting to $3,000. The amazing news inclines Duncan to forget the quarrel and all might have gone well for Ned but for his own folly. Drink arouses him and he makes for Duncan's hut. Peering in he sees the stranger and his bag of gold. He sees Duncan hide it in an old stove leaving Lucy on guard. The two depart on their quest for the watcher, who little dreams the gold is his own. Vengeance is forgotten for greed. He hurries back to the tavern, tells them of the gold, and easily secures their assistance. They go to the hut, Ned hiding outside while the others enter and steal the money. Hidden by sea cliffs, Ned divides his own fortune into four parts and well satisfied bids farewell to the strangers. Duncan and the Westerner wait at his door for him. Duncan insists upon being friends and drags his puzzled nephew home where the terrible truth is learned. Then Ned learns of his overwhelming folly. Lucy spies the strings of the money bag hanging from his pocket and pulls forth the evidence of his complicity. From their sight Ned rushes to the sea where far in the distance he despairingly watches the boat carrying off his well-merited loss.

THE STRANGE BOY (July 19).—Edith Willis, a society girl tired of that unending round of pleasure that her life affords, wishes that she might get a chance to go away from it for a time. On her way to her fashionable summer home she steps out of the parlor car to pick some flowers. A rough-looking tramp accosts her and as he grabs for her purse, Steve, a knight of the road, who had been stealing a ride on the freight car, comes to her aid. The big tramp almost gets the best of Steve in the fight that follows, but Edith, seeing her rescuer's danger, comes to his assistance and strikes the tramp over the head with a wooden rail. By this time Edith's train has drawn out. A sudden shower comes up and Steve carries the girl who has fainted from shock and exposure to the deserted station, where he watches by her side until the storm clears. Then he trudges with her in his arms to the nearest farmhouse where he begs the farmer and his wife to take her in. They feel that they cannot do this for nothing and as Edith has no money Steve offers to work to pay her board.

And, while detectives are scouring the country for the missing heiress, Steve, a tramp, works in the fields that she may be cared for. She recovers and not wishing to leave her new free life she does not tell who she is. But Steve, who has learned to love her and to feel that she loves him in return, sees a picture of her in the papers and an account of her disappearance. Heartbroken at the thought of losing her, he sends a wire to her aunt and then going to her says good-bye, for she will not need any one to care for her longer. But she convinces him that love means more than money and that the heiress cares for him just as she did when he thought she was a poor waif.

THANHOUSER

A CREPE BONNET (July 13).—The young husband was a very "tired business man," but instead of hurrying to the gay lights of Broadway he remained at home in bed and worried the life out of his patient wife. His little daughter was a very active youngster and the noise made by her, assisted by her little playmate, drove him almost frantic. Sympathetic friends called and gravely decided that he had only a short time to live.

The children were cautioned to be very quiet, so as not to disturb the sick man, and they tried very hard to obey the command. A doll, belonging to one of the little girls, was broken, and the children decided to have a funeral.

"But where can we find the crepe," a little girl exclaims in dismay. Willie Jones, who was present, looked mysterious and told them not to worry. He hurried off and soon reappeared with the bonnet of his mother, a widow. The crepe was removed from the bonnet, placed over the doorbell and the doll funeral wended its way from the house to a convenient backyard, where the doll was solemnly interred.

The head of the family gradually felt better and began to take an interest in life. In the meantime his friends noticed the crepe on the door and sadly concluded that he must have passed away. Soon a solemn procession made its way to the house and asked to see the wife. The servant thought they were crazy; the wife was sure of it and called her husband. The visitors cowered behind chairs when the husband appeared and disgustedly asked what was the matter. Then explanations ensued and irate parents sallied forth, seized their offspring and visited summary punishment upon them.

The moral to little folks is this: Don't make your elders ridiculous for they have an awkward habit of making retaliation with slippers or strong right hands.

MAJESTIC

HIS WAY OF WINNING HER (July 19).—Fred is very much in love with Gladys, but her father does not look with favor upon him as a prospective son-in-law. He telephones the girl that he will come to the house at midnight, ready to elope with her. The father overhears the plan and locks his daughter in her room. When Fred arrives he is greeted by a fusillade of rolling pins, flatirons, bricks, etc., and beats a hasty retreat.

The parents decide that they need a chaperon for their disobedient daughter, so they advertise for a stern governess. Fred dresses up and gets the position and is looked upon with favor by the parents. He elopes with Gladys and they are married before the parents find out how they have been fooled.

On the same reel:

GOLD CREEK MINING.—Fred and his pal are hard up and all they have in the world is some worthless mining stock. They put up a job to raise some money on the certificates. Fred drops them on a park bench where several men witness the act, and his friend, disguised as a tramp, picks the stock up. Fred offers a reward for the stock, claiming that it is very valuable, and several men offer the supposed tramp large sums of money for the certificates. The stock is disposed of, and then the two pals hear that the mine has suddenly become very valuable and that the certificates are worth a good deal of money. After much difficulty they finally succeed in buying back the certificates, and then discover that the news was a mistake and that the bonds are still worthless.

SOLAX

THAT DOG (July 23).—That dog was a very wise dog. Snap was her name, and everywhere Tim Babcock went, Snap was sure to go. Tim was a farmer and one evening about seven o'clock he suggested to his wife that he go and get some matches from the village. Mary consented on the condition that he would not be gone more than an hour, so off he went to the village with Snap. At the village tavern and store, however, he met a number of old friends and the time glided smoothly and pleasantly away, and when the hour was up, Snap, who as before mentioned, was a very wise dog, looked at her master's watch and decided that his time was up, and went in to fetch him. After some argument with her master, she failed to overcome the persuasion of his friends; then he decided to remain just a little longer. This disgusted Snap, who besides being a very wise dog, was a very honest and truthful dog, and she therefore decided to drive the buggy home and tell her mistress all about it. Mary is astonished and wrathful on finding that her husband did not come home with the buggy and Snap, and she therefore awaited him on the porch with a rolling pin. All went well until about twelve o'clock, when Tim finally came home and found his wife and Snap asleep on the doorstep. Carefully he wended his way to the kitchen window and entered his home in this way in order not to disturb the repose of his wife. Snap, however, hears a noise and wakes Mary, who, hearing strange noises proceeding from the kitchen, concludes that a tramp has entered through the window. She picks up Snap and sends her to arrest the tramp, and Snap being a very obedient dog, proceeds to arrest him. Tim passes a very disagreeable and painful five minutes with Snap hanging on behind, but is finally rescued by his wife, and promises that he will never stay out late at night again.

LUX

FATE AND THE MAN (July 18).—Some people seem to be born with luck against them. The wife of Richard Stonn was such a one. Her husband had been for some time engaged in nefarious practices, till at last, finding the police hot on his track, he determined to abandon his wife and flee from the country. Left penniless, the unfortunate woman obtains employment at the home of a chemist abroad to take charge of his little girl, a child of some ten years of age. Madam Stonn is exceptionally talented, and in the course of years becomes a capable assistant to the chemist, who has not the faintest idea that her husband is still alive. Eight years pass, and the little girl has grown into a beautiful woman, whilst her friend and teacher has grown to secretly love the man who has proved so good a friend. One day the girl confides in her friend the fact that she has fallen in love with a man whom she met whilst out for a walk, and promises to introduce him to her on the morrow. On the following day an explosion takes place in the chemist's laboratory, and the eyes of the assistant Madam Stonn, are injured by the flames. When, later, the elder woman is brought face to face with her pupil's sweetheart, she seems, with her injured eyes, to recognize dimly the man's features. She listens to his voice, and is at last convinced that the suitor is none other than the man who basely deserted her so many years ago. Turning on the scoundrel she declares her intention of exposing him unless he immediately leaves the country. Stonn flings himself onto his horse, which, maddened by the spurring of its rider, runs away. Rider and steed approach a precipice and, unable to stay their mad flight, are dashed to death on the rocks below. Every cloud has its silver lining, and through the strenuous efforts made by the chemist and his medical friends Madam Stonn recovers the use of her eyes, and when the curtain rings down we are left with the conviction that the scientist will be as good a husband in the future as he has been a friend in the past.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 14).

DENIZENS OF THE DEEP (July 15).—The commonest articles hold a lesson for us if they are only presented from the proper angle. Lobsters and crabs, for instance. These shell fish are so common that their interesting peculiarities have probably escaped the attention of the public. This film, therefore, has a message for every person, for it treats the catching and handling of lobsters and crabs in a manner that covers the subject thoroughly from an educational standpoint and with the maximum of entertainment.

On the same reel:

PORT OF MARSEILLES, FRANCE (Scenic).—A delightful tour of this quiet but very busy little French port, replete with scenes which have made the famous paintings of the old masters.

THE SNOWY EGRET AND ITS EXTERMINATION (July 16).—A new type of picture known as the editorial film! It is powerful, true, gripping, beautiful and pathetic. It tells graphically the story of the cruel procedure necessary to secure the egret used by milliners for the fancy trimming of hats; how the egret is obtainable only during the breeding season of the snowy heron, or snowy egret, and how, with the killing of the father and mother bird, there being no way to feed them, the fledglings are left alone to die. Do not make the mistake of believing the film disagreeable! It is only a statement of plain facts, but, nevertheless, a masterpiece that will sweep the country with a wave of sympathetic understanding of the plight of the birds that will result in necessary national legislation. Book this film! Your women patrons will thank you for acquainting them with true conditions!

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 17).

EASY MONEY (July 17).—Clarence loved Gwendoline and Gwendoline loved Clarence, but Gwenie's father refused to consent to the marriage until Clarence could show his ability to earn $500.00. Clarence started out bravely and got the five hundred, too, but only after the funniest experiences imaginable which include a conviction and sentence for robbing his own home. Another of the famous Pathe-play comedies and the best of the series that is delighting millions of fans throughout the country. Are you getting them?

JIU JITSU (July 18).—An art which, for effectively forestalling the attacks of armed marauders, is unexcelled. An expert demonstrates the innumerable holds obtainable and he and his assistants go through the performance slowly so that all who see may know and understand. The film has the delightful thrill that possesses us when we witness any contest of skill, particularly delightful when right triumphs over wrong. An educational picture that deals with a rarely treated but very necessary branch of education.

On the same reel:

BEAUTIFUL CATALOGNE.—A little jaunt into Spain through the beautiful province of Catalogne with its charming scenes, so quaint, quiet and peaceful.

THE FRIENDLESS INDIAN (July 19).—An old Indian, no longer of use to his tribe, finds himself a weary wanderer with no home but the open prairie. At the risk of his life he proves himself a man of strength and courage by rescuing the child of a white man from death. His only reward is a nod of thanks for, of course, he is a redskin and as such is doomed to walk the world alone.

NESTOR

THEIR LUCKY DAY (July 25).—Hallrooms are not cheerful, even when one's rent is paid and one has dined, but when the landlady, Medusa-faced, stares you in the eyes and your middle zone is vacant, hallrooms are unbearable.

Our two actor friends' long experience had taught them to smile, even at misfortune; so, braving the ogress in the hall, they descend to the street smiling.

At the corner of Broad street the boys almost collide with Hal Bland, who very enthusiastically tells of his engagement at the Savoy. An engagement! Ha! that's what the boys want. Forthwith they storm the Savoy but—the rotund manager says, "Cast is full just now." The boys' hearts sink as they picture Medusa-face in the hall waiting—but, the manager is saying, "The leading man, I'm afraid, won't quite do, so leave your address with me in case of a change." Bowing politely the boys leave.

Medusa-face, backed by a burly janitor, forbids their entrance to their room, so with knowledge born of many similar experiences, the boys climb up the fire escape.

"Bats" they must have, and Jimmie is dispatched with their last valuable to gain the sinkers and coffee necessary to existence. Mac determines on a bath—a luxury which may not be in reach soon again—and, disrobing, seeks the tub.

Meanwhile, Medusa enters the room with her janitor and loads all the clothing—Mac's included—into a trunk and decamps. Mac appears to investigate the noise, and finds the only costume left him is his bathrobe. The phone rings at this crisis and, horror of horrors, the Savoy manager demands his instant appearance for rehearsal as the leading man is N. G.

Jimmie, doing second-story work via the fire escape, enters, but poor Mac cannot eat for worrying. Suddenly an idea comes—Jimmie has clothes. To be sure, Jimmie is 5 ft. 6 and Mac is 6 ft. 2, but the change is made, and with the addition of gauntlets, puttees and a crop Mac sallies into the Savoy looking very sporty. Jimmie, in bathrobe, is startled by a key turning in his door and dashes into the bathroom. Medusa-face now enters with two gushing girls. These she establishes and, to Jimmie's horror, they begin to unpack.

Meanwhile Mac has made good at rehearsal and is invited to lunch with the leading lady. Now, remembering his short sleeves, Mac affects a mannerism and refuses to remove his gloves.

Jimmie's last stronghold—the bathroom—is assaulted by the girls, who call the landlady and janitor to assist them. Seeing escape impossible Jimmie drops out the window, almost on top of a burly policeman, who, when he recovers from his surprise, pursues the already fleeing Jimmie.

The leading lady and Mac rescue Jimmie from the law, and a "touching" appeal to the manager puts all things right, even to the reinstatement of the boys in the first floor bedroom by Medusa.

CRYSTAL

THE BROKEN SPELL (July 22).—Bob's father dies leaving his entire estate to Bob. The young man, immensely wealthy, is looked upon by everybody in the county in which he lives as a very desirable husband. Bob and Mary, the pretty country miss, are sweethearts. Valerie Monroe, a worldly woman from the city, is out automobiling in the country and stops for refreshments at the farm of Mary's people. There she meets Bob and, upon being informed that he is a very wealthy young man, designs to get some of his fortune. She leaves and Bob sees her to her automobile. She invites him to visit her in the city and he seems to have fallen to her charms. Later he determines to visit the city and try and see a little of life outside of the hum-drum country existence he has always lived. He visits Valerie and, being smitten with her beauty, falls in love with her. She works a game on him and writes a letter to herself which informs her that the mortgage on her father's homestead is due and about to be foreclosed unless two thousand dollars is paid at once. She shows Bob the letter purporting to have been written by her father to her and he offers to give her the money. She demurely refuses, but eventually accepts. She managed things so that upon each of Bob's visits her child Rose has been absent from the house, and he never suspects that she is a married woman and has a growing child. Bob, walking along the street the next day, saves a child from being run over by a runaway horse. He then continues on his way to Valerie's home. Previous to this he had written Mary that he liked the city exceptionally well and telling her he did not think that he would ever return to the country. The poor girl is nearly heartbroken. Bob arrives at Valerie's house and does not mention anything about the runaway. The child returns while Bob is there, and upon seeing him, informs her mother that Bob saved her life. Valerie thanks Bob as only a mother can, but the poor boy, enamoured as he was, only to discover that the recipient of his honest intention was a married woman who has used him as a plaything to extort money from, rushes from the house. Just as he is about to leave, Valerie's maid arrives and gives him a letter from Valerie. She writes that she is more than grateful for his action in saving the only being on earth that she really has any love for, and returns his money. Bob hastens home and, finding Mary still waiting for him, clasps her in his arms and vows never to leave her or his country home again.

POWERS

MENTAL SUICIDE (July 25).—Neilan, an architect, young and ambitious, having graduated with honors, procures a position as assistant in the city architect's office.

Although hearts are willing, his love affair with Toddles seems hopeless owing to Toddles' sense of duty as a sister to Pauline, an invalid. Neilan calls upon Toddles and presses her for a definite answer to his proposal. Toddles refuses, telling him she cannot marry while her sister lives.

Pauline suffers a relapse, due to her mental agitation, and the doctor advises Toddles that the only hope of prolonging Pauline's life is the South American climate. Toddles, in despair, appeals to her lawyer, and he informs her that their inheritance is nearly exhausted. When Neilan calls, she tells him of their difficulties, and he generously offers all the money he possesses, but to her dismay she finds that the funds will not be sufficient to cover the expenses of such a trip.

Neilan returns to the office, too despondent to work. When his clerk brings in two bids on a city contract for him to inspect, he lays them aside and broods over Pauline's illness. Kirkland, one of the contractors submitting a bid calls upon Neilan and offers five thousand dollars for an acceptance of his bid. Neilan indignantly orders him from the office, but later, thinking it over, sees a chance for sending Pauline to South America and making himself and Toddles happy. He runs after the contractor and tells him he agrees to accept the bribe.

Kirkland immediately goes to his hotel and, passing Reid, the other contractor, at the entrance, laughingly sneers at him. Reid is suspicious of Kirkland's attitude, and follows him. He sees Kirkland seated at one of the hotel desks near the window, writing. Reid enters the hotel and comes up just as Kirkland is leaving. He sits down at the desk Kirkland has just vacated, still perplexed and suspicious, and finds the blotter which Kirkland had used. On it is an imprint of the check Kirkland had drawn, payable to Neilan. Reid takes the blotter and hurriedly leaves.

Pauline, in the meantime, weighed down by her hopeless illness and feeling herself a barrier to Toddles, is sinking rapidly, and Toddles hurriedly sends for the doctor. Neilan, in his office, receives the check which Kirkland sent by messenger, but very shortly thereafter Reid calls and confronts Neilan with the evidence of the blotter and succeeds in convincing Neilan that he is doing wrong. Neilan tears the check up, whereupon Reid also tears the damaging evidence against him. When, later, Kirkland calls for the acceptance of his bid, Neilan hands him the torn check.

When the doctor arrives at Toddles' urgent call he finds Pauline dying and sends Toddles from the room. When Neilan comes to tell Toddles of his failure to raise the necessary money for Pauline's trip, he meets the doctor coming from the house, who informs him of Pauline's death.

REX

THE ACTOR (July 27).—Lloyd Warrington, a stock actor, is with his wife and family in the West. He notes an article in the Dramatic Mirror to the effect that Western actors are receiving more recognition in the East; and despite his wife's protests, he decides to go try for a part in one of the Broadway theatres. He leaves home and goes to New York.

Several unsuccessful weeks elapse. Lloyd fails to get employment and as a last resort applies at the office of Charles Lohman, a big producer, who refuses to see him. As he turns to leave, he meets Gilbert Light, an old friend, who has made good, and through Light's influence he is given an interview with Lohman and makes a favorable impression. Lohman shows him a part in a new play and promises to give him a chance at it. Lloyd leaves the office delighted.

In his little hall bedroom he reads over the part he is to have and is well pleased with it and dreams of how he is to make good in it, when a letter from Lohman arrives saying that the management is afraid to try him out, being only a Western actor, perhaps not strong enough for the part and with no Broadway reputation. He is heartbroken, when his friend Light comes in. Light is shown the letter and suggests a plan to convince Lohman and the author both of his ability.

Lloyd and Light dress and go to the club, where Lohman and the author are spending the evening. They speak to them as they pass and sit down at a nearby table to play cards. As they play, Lloyd picks a quarrel with Light and is seen by Lohman and the author. The quarrel results in Lloyd's rising and shooting Light in the presence of all the club members. Lohman is panic-stricken at the coldblooded murder and almost overcome by the excitement. Lloyd makes his escape from the room, leaving Lohman to be taken care of by the attendants.

A few moments later when Lohman is somewhat revived and the author has recovered his nerve, Lloyd re-enters the scene and explains that he was simply staging the big scene from Lohman's play to convince him of his ability. Lohman is again overcome and realizes Lloyd's ability, giving him a contract on the spot.

The night of the opening performance witnesses Lloyd's triumph, surrounded by his family.

THE GREATER CALL (Three Reel) (July 23).—Mrs. Worthington, a New York society woman, is in despair over the peculiar attitude of mind her daughter Margaret entertains toward wealthy Joe Morton and marriage. Margaret considers him an idler, with no thought but that of his own pleasure, and in instant proof of her contention, she indicates from her point of vantage in the library his customary absorption in the game, where her brother's cronies are gathered in the billiard room. Like a bolt from the clear sky, Mrs. Worthington learns by telegram that her mining properties in Northern Canada are involved in a situation which threatens to sweep away her fortune unless she is prepared to spend vast sums in litigation. She begs the recalcitrant Margaret to accept Joe Morton that evening, as his means would save her mother from temporary, possibly permanent, poverty. Margaret, sated with the artificialities of society, cannot bring herself to this sacrifice, but sets a blessed opportunity for herself in this misfortune. Her brother is to leave immediately for the Worthington mines, and she pleads until all objections are swept away, to be allowed to go with him, for the call of the wild finds an echo in her long-repressed self.

Dick and Margaret, after a long, arduous journey, arrive in the ore-embedded wilderness whence their family fortunes spring. Neighbors are few and far between—the nearest being a day's hard riding from the bungalow.

Polka Holla Camp, the centre of sociability for a hundred miles around, has the doubtful honor of counting the two most lawless men of the north among its habitues—Ray Rust, the wolf, and Steven Stone, the strong man. Embroiled in every manner of evil, these two had but lately been driven from camp for card cheating, and settled in the vicinity of Worthington bungalow. One had spied Margaret on horseback one day and followed the beautiful girl home unseen. He confided his discovery to the other, and these two depraved creatures planned to swoop down on her and carry the trophy to their stench-ridden camp.

The propitious day came when Dick left Margaret alone to escort two visiting girls to their distant camp. She felt safe enough during the afternoon with Dick's gun at hand, but the dusk brought misgivings. The silence seemed ominous. It was broken suddenly by a creaking door. Before Margaret could lift the gun she found herself in the presence of the two evil men whom she knew by repute to be devoid of a single scruple. They gazed at her appreciatively. The girl saw them shake dice for her possession and knew that her only hope of aid lay in either of these men. She turned to them, saying quietly, "You will be killed for this when my brother returns, unless . . . I promise to go quietly if one of you will give me his name." Rust derided her suggestion. Stone, barely sober, slapped her on the back as a true sport and told Rust her word would be law; they were to fight it out and the best man win. Rust reluctantly withdrew to the open and from her window Margaret witnessed a fearful struggle between these primitive men. Stone, the victor, entered, and bluntly told her to hurry and leave. They made a detour to reach a minister and were married.

Dick returned, found a pitiful note of farewell from his sister, but no clue to her whereabouts. After a vain search of many months he returned to his mother with the bitter news, which almost killed the poor woman. Steven found his nature changing day by day, through love of the woman he had forced into marriage. His manhood was finding itself at last, but she was too fearful of the brute as she had first known him to yield more than obedience to him. He told her of his claim to rich beds of ore all around them, and begged her to return to civilization with him and take her place as the wealthiest of women, but Margaret remained obdurate.

She awoke one day to the shocking realization that they were to have a child. The thought was fearful. She begged him to leave her, for he was not worthy to be known to her child as its father. He consented, and made ready to start her on her journey home. During the evening they became lost in a snowstorm and death seemed imminent until Steven discovered the signpost of Polka Holla Camp, which also notified the world at large that within the vicinity he, the card cheat, could be shot on sight. A hush fell on the camp as the two entered. Then, as all recognized Steven, guns came into play. Margaret, learning of Steven's heroism for her sake, stood between him and the men of the camp saying they would have to harm her as well as him. Bricktop Tillie, the terror of the camp, suddenly came forward to champion her cause, and gave them her shack over night. In the morning Margaret would not go on, but returned with Steven.

Ray Rust learned of the camp incident. Seeing an opportunity to get even with Steven, he journeyed to Margaret's home in the city, told of her whereabouts, and offered to lead her brother there. Dick returned with him and carried off Margaret, now ailing, to her mother. Rust, attempting to murder Stone, only wounded him.

Steven, while convalescing, learned the word of God from the camp chaplain. Rust, arrested for the attempted murder, was brought before him for identification, but he refused to recognize him. Rust floundered in consternation, the more so when Steven pressed upon him his own prized copy of the Bible and earnestly begged him to prospect there for spiritual wealth, which was far more enduring than the material.

Back home, Margaret was taking sad pleasure in her little son. Impulsive Nance, trying to impersonate Providence, wrote Steven, asking him to come and see his son. Steven, in a transport of happiness, responded. Nance and Mrs. Worthington, taken aback at this handsome, powerful looking man, could not connect him with Margaret's portrayal of the man she first knew. Dick, inclined to throw Steven out, was persuaded by Margaret to leave them alone. She gently asked him to leave. Again he acceded for her happiness sake. But the baby's shoe, which he had been fingering nervously remained in his hand. Margaret, alone, was conscious-stricken. The greater call, her child's right to its father, had sounded. She cried out in her anguish, calling aloud her husband's name. As though in answer he returned, to leave with her the little shoe, which would have been too keen a reminder of what his lawless youth was now costing him. Margaret, seeing in his face the terrible struggle that this man's soul was enduring, felt that his punishment has been great enough. She sighed with relief, and surrendered herself to his yearning arms.

SCENE FROM "THEODORA"—A THREE-REEL WARNER'S FEATURE

"101 BISON"

WHEN SHERMAN MARCHED TO THE SEA (July 19).—Mrs. Margaret Oswald, a wealthy widow, lives on her plantation near the sea coast at Savannah, Georgia, and with her are her two grown sons, Robert and Jack, and her daughter Gertie, the latter being aged seven years. Henry Bennett is overseer of the negro slaves on the plantation. Robert is opposed to slavery and announces his intention to go north and fight with Lincoln's men. Jack denounces Robert's sentiments. Overseer Bennett treats the slaves cruelly, and Bob thrashes him, incurring Bennett's hatred.

Jeff Davis calls for more volunteers to strengthen the rebel army. Phyllis, daughter of a widow living near the Oswald plantation, is betrothed to Robert, but condemns his Union sentiments and returns the engagement ring. Bob goes north and enlists in the Federal army. Jack joins the Confederate troops. Overseer Bennett travels north and joins the Union forces and acts as a Confederate spy.

Three years then elapse. Jack is shown serving in the Confederate army secret service, and is given a message by General Hardee to take to General Brown, advising Hardee that Sherman's "bummers" are nearing Savannah. Sherman's camp is shown, where Robert is a Union officer and is sent by Sherman to destroy a bridge across Turner's Bay near the Oswald home. Robert's brother, Jack, carrying Hardee's message, arrives at the bridge when Robert and his soldiers are putting powder under the timbers. Phyllis and Gertie, on an outing, arrive at the bridge. Robert meets Jack and demands the message. A fight follows. Jack is arrested and led away. Union and rebel troops arrive and fight a battle on the bridge, the Unionists being victorious. The retreating rebels are reinforced and return, whereupon Bob gives the word and the bridge is blown up, the structure and the rebels being wiped out.

General Sherman, when Jack is brought in as a prisoner, orders him shot as a spy. Bennett, serving in Sherman's army as a secret aid to the Confederacy, determines to help Jack escape and make it appear that Robert, who once thrashed him, aided his brother Jack to get away.

Gertie leaves home and makes her way into Sherman's camp to aid her condemned brother Robert. Bennett steals Robert's coat and hat out of his tent and gives them to Jack, gains the guard's attention, and Jack escapes. Bennet falsely accuses Bob, and the latter is sentenced to be shot.

Bennett, later, is mortally wounded and tells Sherman that Robert is innocent, obtaining Robert's exoneration and release from custody.

Robert and a detachment are sent on a scouting trip. They learn that a rebel troop train is coming and plant powder under the railroad track. When the train is over the powder the fuse is ignited and the explosion destroys the locomotive, cars and the rebel troops.

Sherman orders his cavalry scouts to patrol the ocean shore near Fort McAllister. Jack and fifty rebel cavalrymen stop on the seashore beneath a cliff fifty feet high, when the tide waves roll against the base of the cliff. About sixty of Sherman's mounted soldiers, including Robert, meet the rebel cavalrymen at the cliff shore and a thrilling, spectacular battle ensues in water four feet deep.

General Sherman, on top of the cliff, directs the fire of artillerymen on the rebels below. Many of the warring cavalrymen are shot off their horses and their bodies toss in the surf. The Union cavalrymen finally win the battle. Phyllis arrives, sees her brother wounded in the surf, and wades out and rescues him. Jack dies on the shore rocks, Robert arriving at his side in time to hear his brother's last words, of forgiveness.

ESSANAY

THE TWO RANCHMEN (July 19).—Joe Churchill, a ranchman, quarrels with his neighbor, Fred Martin, over the big opening in the fence, which allows Martin's chickens to dig up all of Churchill's seeds. Churchill's daughter, Dorothy, quarrels with Mrs. Martin about the affair. The two women end the feud by a hair-pulling match. Both ranchmen hitch up and leave to notify the sheriff. On the way to town, Martin's horse runs away, turns over the buggy, and kills the ranchman. Churchill returns to his ranch with the sheriff, but when told of the death of his neighbor, dismisses the officer. A year later, Churchill falls in love with Martin's widow. Can you imagine the surprise when Churchill presents his new wife to his daughter?

PILOT

GRANNY (July 17).—Eileen is a wealthy orphan who attends a fashionable boarding schools for girls, where she is a great favorite, and frequently gives them midnight lunches and parties, to the chagrin of the teachers.

When the other girls go home for their vacations, Eileen has to remain at school, and during one of her lonely spells, she writes to her aunt that she is going to move to their town, buy a home and adopt one of her family, which consists of Molly, Beth, Jack, the baby, and an old granny, who spends most of her time in an attic room, almost neglected by the rest of the family.

Eileen shows her a great deal of attention, much to the surprise and displeasure of the others, who have no time to waste on the old lady.

The day comes for Eileen to make her choice. The mother has dressed the children in their best and hopes that the baby will be the favored one, but Eileen brushes by the family and ascends to the old granny's room, and makes the dear old soul the recipient of her bounty.

When the granny is comfortably installed in the beautiful mansion that Eileen has bought, the children come to ask forgiveness, and do not depart empty-handed, as the generous old lady shares with them the money she has gotten from Eileen.

Thus the story teaches the beautiful Scriptural admonition: "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land the Lord thy God giveth thee."

GREAT NORTHERN

THE JOLLY RECRUITS (July 12).—When the time arrives for the annual militia encampment, Chris and Fred arrive in the best of spirits, but their old companion, Jack, puts in an appearance in bad temper and does not take kindly to the army routine that is mapped out for him. Instead of getting the sympathy of his friends, the latter decide to take some of the laziness out of him and plan a number of pranks for his especial edification. As soon as they arrive in the camp they are greeted by their comrades, but as Jack is in bad humor he declines to enter into the spirit of their frivolity. He decides to go to slumber in the straw and, after partially disrobing, wraps his army blanket about him and lies down to pleasant dreams. The fun starts at this point. Chris and Fred discover a nest of white rats and proceed to place them in the trousers of the slumbering Jack. The result may readily be imagined, and when Jack is aroused he runs from the barracks and seeks rest elsewhere. Then it is that his tormentors scare him with "property snakes." Again there is a mixup and Jack decides to desert for good, and makes all speed across the wild sweep of the wheat fields. Again he tries to fall asleep in a hay stack and a blundering farm hand this time foils him by setting fire to the harvest. When Jack is finally captured and returned to his quarters he is a wiser and sorrier man, and the entire company of which he is a member greet him with shouts of derision.

GAUMONT

A TROMBONE MARATHON (July 10).—Æsop's fables of the frog who tried to swell himself to the dimensions of a bull is about the only parallel which comes to mind when viewing the efforts of Max, sole trombonist at the Grand Theatre. Max has seen tidings of a strange request: $25,000 is awaiting the musician who can play "The Maiden's Prayer" for twenty-four hours without stopping, and Max resolves to win that bequest or die in the attempt. Only two more days and the time limit expires. Kiki, his sweetheart, urges him on to win the prize, as otherwise her obdurate guardian will not entertain his suit for Kiki's hand. "Win, or burst," and he goes to it with a will and vim. What twenty-four hours of continuous tromboning can produce can be much better seen than described in language. Max, with protruding eyes and distended cheeks makes a funny sight indeed. More than once he is literally at the last gasp, but love supports him until twenty-three hours and fifty-nine minutes have elapsed—at which point the neighbors rush in with murderous intentions. The lawyer waked from the stupor which the soloist's unending blast has brought about, and when it is known that Max, now limply hanging about his fiancee's neck, has won the $25,000, the applause is deafening.

WITH HONOR AT STAKE (Two Reel) (July 15).—We have here a two-reel release of more than ordinary interest, containing an abundance of novel situations.

Mrs. D'Arcy W. Martin's adoring husband learns that his wife is suffering from heart trouble and the doctor advises that she avoid all excitement. At the Hortons' reception in Paris, Mrs. Martin unexpectedly meets George Molyneaux, a sweetheart of youthful days, for whom she yet retains a lingering affection. Molyneaux is the possessor of a packet of Mrs. Martin's early love letters, and she asks him to return them. He writes her a note expressing his willingness to hand her back these compromising missives, but asks that she will, just for the final good-bye, come in person to receive them. Mrs. Martin, knowing his honorable nature, agrees to do this, and we see her in George's home. He goes to fetch the letters from a deed box, but hearing a sharp cry of pain rushes back to her, only to find Mrs. Martin quite prostrate. Molyneaux is terrified; he thinks Madeline is dead, and his only thought is now to find some means whereby the honor of the woman he loves can be sustained. The hours drag on, Molyneaux' only recourse is to lovingly and tenderly inter the body in a leafy sepulchre in the nearby woods. He slaves for hours at the making of a grave.

Meanwhile Mrs. Martin's husband has become alarmed at her long absence, and when he hears from the Police Commissioner that his wife's handbag has been discovered on the person of a thief, he jumps to the worst conclusion, and accuses the alleged thief of killing his wife for the purpose of robbery. When Molyneaux gets back to the house, he is overjoyed to find the woman whom he thought dead has returned to life, and had suffered nothing but a sudden heart attack. Mrs. Martin examines her watch and, finding how late the hour is, hurries off home to her distracted husband and much-prized baby. Mr. Martin is in the seventh heaven of delight to see his wife alive and well, and promptly telephones for the release of the suspect, whilst Mrs. Martin allays all suspicion by informing her husband that whilst taking a walk in the woods she was suddenly seized with a heart attack, which excuse amply accounts for her long absence.

"A Prince of Evil"

RELEASED SATURDAY, JULY 26.

The story of an unscrupulous man intent upon marrying a wealthy girl who loves another man. The lengths to which the Prince goes, the compromising situations that he devises, make this a picture of swift-moving romance and adventure. This is a Vitagraph film in 2 reels.

"A Dash for Liberty"

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JULY 30.

A woman detective is one of the interesting characters in this 2 reel Lubin picture. She fascinates the defaulting bank bookkeeper and all but has her case complete when he scents trouble, jumps on a locomotive and dashes away. The flight, the pursuit and the capture make as exciting a series of events as can be imagined.

The Reel Lesson of the International Exhibit

If the International Exhibit accomplished nothing else, it impressed upon the exhibitors of the country more clearly than ever before that the sheer merit of General Film Service, in single reels as well as multiples, is in a class by itself. The constant expressions of appreciation of that thought, heard on every side, were extremely gratifying to those of us who have been striving to leave nothing undone that would make the standard unique in its excellence. It is a pleasure to announce four more multiple features that illustrate this idea perfectly.

"The Girl and the Gangster"

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 28.

The conflict of the two greatest emotions in the life of an attractive sales girl—her fear of her father and her love for a boy friend. It takes the explosion of an infernal machine in a crowded tenement to clear up the tangle which these three make of their lives. The Kalem Company produce this picture in 2 reels.

"The Springtime of Life"

RELEASED FRIDAY, AUGUST 1.

It took three reels to tell this story in which the center figure is a grand opera star. Her struggles, her achievements and her love for the man who made her career a possibility are the elements in this interesting and exceptional picture. It's a Patheplay.

1,000 per cent PROFIT

Did you ever stop to consider the evolution of the motion picture and the progress it has made in the amusement business of the world? It has blazed a trail that has no ending. Do you ever think of the millions of capital that is being invested in this gigantic enterprise? Every year in your city magnificent, palatial theatres are being erected, so in a short time, the smaller picture houses will have to go out of existence, as you cannot compete with the big fellows and afford to pay motion picture trusts the money that they will ask of you shortly. In other words, the smaller picture house will be throttled by the monopoly. What are you going to do about it? There is only one solution to the question.

"SHOOTING MOVING PICTURES"

It's a Combination Shooting Gallery and Moving Picture Show. Motion pictures thrown upon a screen, made of white paper, brilliantly illuminated so that a bullet piercing the screen causes the puncture to shine out like a star. At the same time the film stops automatically. The value of the invention is that it is exactly the same as firing at living objects. This new, unique and fascinating invention has complete films showing Soldiers in Entrenchments, Battleships at Sea, Wild Beasts in the Forest, and other animated objects. All can be shot at, moving rapidly as they do in life.

"Shooting Moving Pictures" will take the place of 75 per cent. of the store shows in the United States and Canada. They are the fad in London, Paris, Berlin and all of Europe and has developed into a craze.

THE LESSON OF THE WEEK

LAST week I wrote an editorial on "Fraternity" principally in connection with the convention and the exposition. Some say it was a little premature considering the events that took place while we were on the press. I do not think so. I can express the same sentiments now that the convention and exposition are past, and have become a memory, a memory that will constantly rise in the minds of the men and women who visited New York during the week of 7th-12th of July, 1913. It will be a living memory, a memory of great and glowing success. I have not filled my columns with matter that the newspapers were full of, regarding the split and the quarrels that occurred, believing that this paper has a higher mission than to report such incidents, which will readily adjust themselves in the near future, and like a bad temper it will be forgotten, and if it is not forgotten it will cause to rise up a feeling of regret that such feeling occurred.

Much could be written on the subject as to the rights and the wrongs of the situation, but one thing I want specially to point out is the fact that M. A. Neff was elected president of the National Exhibitors' League with a large majority, and that those who were defeated walked out. This is not right in any fraternal organization, let it be whatsoever it will. When a Worshipful Master, Worthy Dictator, an Illustrious Commander, an Illustrious Grand Commander-in-Chief, a Chief Ranger, or whatever other title might be used is elected, the majority always rules, and the minority, however much disgruntled or dissatisfied they may be, bow down to the majority, remain faithful and pledge renewed allegiance to the elected head.

I remember when the discussion of the question of New York being selected as the city to hold the convention of 1913 took place in Chicago; a promise was made on the floor of the convention "that New York City or State would not nominate a candidate; that New York with its delegation would support the administration of President Neff." The convention and the exhibitors now know how this promise was kept. It may be that the minority who walked out from the convention know their business better than I do; at the same time it was a scene to be regretted, and I sincerely trust the olive branch of peace will be held out, and the peace pipe once more smoked, giving allegiance to the grandest organization of the day.

It is ten thousand pities that men who have worked so hard and so earnestly in the advancement of Cinematography should be out of the fold of an organization destined to amalgamate and uphold the rights of the exhibitors. I have no quarrel with those who seceded. They may be perfectly right in their views, and feel fully justified in the action they took. Time will show the wisdom of the step they have taken. All honor is due to the three men who remained loyal to New York State Exhibitors' League and in whose hands the charter of the State is now placed. They will work with great odds against them, but in the long run right will prevail and time will show which is right.

Leaving the convention and coming to the exposition proper I want to say that a torch has been lit and raised aloft which will be a beacon light to Cinematography in the future. I little thought when I suggested that an international exposition be held in New York, while the national convention was here, that it would be the vast success it has proved to be. When in conversation with two or three at Chicago, I said then that it could not fail, and little by little it grew to be an accomplished fact, and when it was decided to hold the exposition the number of promoters who desired to handle the same were legion, but I steered the committee clear from those who wanted to make money out of the exhibitors' work and energies. I took the committee to the trustees of the Grand Central Palace; they agreed to finance and help the committee to make it a success, and under the leadership of Rich G. Hollaman (one of the vice-presidents of the Grand Central Palace) the result has justified the action I took.

The thought is now with me, and I want to impress it forcibly upon the minds of the manufacturers, or upon the exhibitors, both licensed and unlicensed, that such an event must be of annual occurrence, and in my opinion a committee should be formed to undertake this work. The public were wonderfully interested and were sorry that it had come to an end on Saturday evening; many have been the queries to me since then asking when there will be another. I am confident that if an able committee, or even if a company were formed to exploit the Cinematograph art, it would be one great success year by year, and I want to interpolate a thought here that this committee formulate some rules whereby a medal or medals of superiority or supremacy should be given to product of a mechanical nature, or a new invention, or a greater perfection of photography. I would suggest that a studio should be fitted up with lights, etc., and that the actual taking of a picture, with its development and projection, should be made a feature, because many people came to see a picture taken with all its appurtenances and went away disappointed.

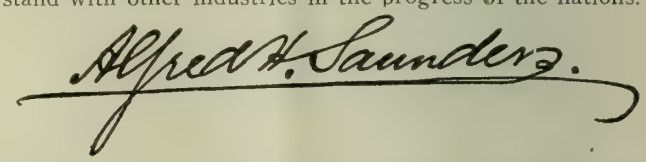
Another thought that comes to me is that the funds accumulated should not go to enrich shareholders or stockholders, but that a fund should be set aside to relieve the needy operators or camera men or other employees who through accident or sickness have lost what little they had. A case in point which occurred a year or two ago will illustrate what I mean. A careful operator had saved something like $460 to $470 and was doing very well; suddenly grim disease stalked in and out of this fund he had to pay $250 for an operation upon and medical attendance for his wife. Then working in the booth he accidentally injured his thumb. Blood poisoning setting in, he had to give up his work; gradually all his savings vanished, until one day there appeared before him two alternatives, borrowing money or appealing to the charity of his friends to save him from being dispossessed. I took his case to a friend who had influence with the charity organizations, who sent a check with a request that a certain sum be given to this man as long as he needed it per week. One $5 was given to the man and then it took three months to make inquiries into the antecedents of this poor starving operator and his family, until his thumb became quite cured and he was able to secure work again; then the society favorably reported upon the case. He needed no further assistance, returning a check for the sum that was not used. How great! how magnanimous!! was this charity organization. Had it not been for the assistance of a few friends the man would have starved. This is only one case. There may be many others that such a fund would be of great assistance to aid in their extremities.

Again, take our poor old chum, Bill Paley, out in Los Angeles; without a friend or a dime to his name. Such a fund would have brought him back and given him proper attendance here, and if a wing of a hospital could be endowed, called the Cinematograph ward or wing, what a wonderful monument for posterity would this be! So I make this appeal to the best, the highest, the most intelligent members of Cinematography, to rally round a standard with this end in view, and those who follow after will call you blessed.

Another point I want to impress upon the industry is the fact of the great intelligent masses that visited the Grand Central Palace; they came to learn and went away astonished at the great advances made. There were educationalists of the highest order as well as the people interested in seeing the pictures exhibited. Two United States Senators were present and I badly wanted to introduce them to the various members assembled on the floor, but they stated emphatically that they had come "incog" and desired that their presence should not be known. It was my privilege to conduct them around and show them the various improvements that had been made.

The church was remarkably well represented by practically every denomination, and nothing but the highest praise did I hear from the lips of those with whom I conversed. The week was the advancement of one of the highest educational movements that it was possible to conceive, and I trust that the fire of the beacon will be kept ever burning, and that next year greater improvements in color photography, in talking and singing pictures, and the higher class of pictures to be shown will result from this exposition.

Can I say more? Yes, I can say this, that through this exposition the Cinematograph art took a leap to a very much higher pedestal than some of the present-day manufacturers ever imagined it could ever reach, and now the greatest aim in view is for the manufacturers to keep it where it is to-day; in a very little while the store shows will have passed away, and the great theatres of our land will be showing pictures worthy of being seen, in feature, or in single reels. The educational movement will have advanced so far ahead that if it is possible from expositions a fund might be laid aside for the special making of educational films, subsidizing a company for their especial manufacture; such a company will have to be formed, and such work must be undertaken; those who are now in the business must very quickly put their houses in order, so that they may be ready for the time when educationalists will demand the clearest and most perfect photography for this purpose that can be produced. Some manufacturers say the people are not ready, and that they are waiting until there is a demand. The people are ready, and as soon as there is a supply the demand will come in such volume that the manufacturers will be flooded and swamped with orders. Colleges, universities and schools everywhere are asking for films to teach all kinds of subjects relating to the sciences, and I now ask that scientists step in and take a hand in this forward movement. By so doing the lessons of the exposition week will not be lost, but that the cry will be Forward, and yet Forward until true fraternity is evolved from Cinematography, and that the industry takes its stand with other industries in the progress of the nations.



LOCAL No. 1, MOVING PICTURE OPERATORS' UNION

I want to congratulate my brother operators of Local No. 1 on the great victory obtained by Brother Robert Goldblatt, president, in convention of the American Federation of Labor held at Seattle during the past week. Brother Goldblatt was seated in the convention, and a charter granted to Local No. 1. F. H. Richardson representing Branch No. 35 of the I. A. T. S. E. was refused admittance to the convention and unseated as a delegate of the branch through its non-recognition by the federation. It is evident No. 1 is now the representative of the operators in Greater New York. The following clipping from "The Call," a well-known labor paper is my authority for the above congratulations:

Seattle, Wash., July 15.—At the convention of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees here, the New York Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, was granted a charter. This is the result of a five-year struggle for recognition. F. H. Richardson, the delegate sent by the rival New York Union. Branch Local 35, of the I. A. T. S. E., was unseated.

The following officers were elected: Charles Shay, of New York, president; Lee M. Hart, of Chicago, secretary-treasurer.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of New York was formed when there was a secession from Branch 35, of the International Alliance, more than one year ago. It has a membership of more than 600 to-day. It is affiliated with the A. F. of L. A. H. S.

EXPOSITION REFLECTIONS

By Horace Vinton
(The Mahoney)

'MIDST a pandemonium of confused sounds, above which could be distinguished at intervals, an inharmonious blending of "When the Sands of the Desert Grow Cold," and "To Have and to Hold"; little knots of two, three, four and five, persons, laughing, chattering and chirping, gradually increased in number, until the exodus became a mass of moving, swaying, stumbling humanity, descended the broad staircase of the new Grand Central Palace.

It was Saturday night, July 12th, 1913.

We state this fact, as data for future generations, as data is somewhat obscured in (the past) as to many transpirings in the cinematography industry.

It was the final night of the First International Exposition of the Moving Picture Art and Allied Trades, and only one of the many great events that are sure to follow, as the week's developments were fraught with such unequivocal success that repetitions, with improved conditions, are a certainty.

With several daily papers, contributed to and edited by a most efficient staff of able dissertators—all widely known in the world of literature and the newspaper, that to present original or even readable matter on the subject, is a task almost as hopeless as it would be to prepare an original three reel feature scenario, a popular novel, or successful "crook" drama.

From early Monday morning, until the lights were dimmed late Saturday night, a constant stream of visitors, all notables, in the moving picture field, were evidenced in and around the immense structure.

The program for the week, as arranged by the executive heads, Mr. Neff, Mr. Trigger, Mr. Tichenor, L. R. Thomas, Mr. Samuels, Chas. Kerr, Mr. Hilkemeier, was carried out with a degree of accuracy never before accomplished in any kindred undertaking.

Every preliminary announcement was strictly adhered to, and one only had to consult the bulletin board at the top of the great stair-case to become familiar with the day's projects.

Monday was Universal day; and through the courtesy of Carl Laemmle, the pioneer of all manufacturers in the ranks of the Independents, the one man who is unafraid, who is ever ready to follow the dictates of his own convictions, a vast army of exhibitors and visiting delegates were regally entertained.

As if by a preconcerted plan, the building was deserted by most of the visiting contingent on Monday to give the valiant representative of the press time to sharpen his pencil and his wit and refill his fountain pen.

All day long such notables as "Hughy" D'Arcy, of the Lubin forces (it is needless to chronicle the fact that "Hughey" is the author of "The Face on the Floor," as he has given world-wide publicity to this matter of literary importance, for a quarter of a century past); J. B. Clymer, of "Itala"; S. M. Spedon, of the Vitagraph, probably the oldest in point of years in the industry; Stanley Twist, whose name has been known almost as long as the Selig trademark; Willard Holcomb, of Kinemacolor, who sat in judgment of the "legitimate" actor long before he extolled the merits of that wonderful company; L. W. McChesney, who watches the interests of the General Film Company; Bert Adler, who is accused of writing every funny paragraph that appears anonymously relating to the doings of some one notable in the industry; then there was Joe Brandt, whose activities are so numerous and varied, in behest of the Universal interests, that it would be too difficult to mention them comprehensively.

The last view we had of Joe on Monday was dashing madly about the hall, megaphone in hand, rounding up the delegates, with the sagacity of a well trained "Collie," for a visit to the Mecca Building, the Eclair Studio and one of the most eventful evenings of the entire week for the visiting delegates at Palisades Park.

Owen F. Doud, Don Meany, Joe McArdle, and others equally well known, complete a list of "promoters of publicity," who give real life to the trade paper and makes it worth reading.

Daniel Frohman, long and honorably known with all that is clean and artistic in the theatre of this country, was a visitor to the Exposition on Monday.

Mr. Frohman is now the managing director of the Famous Players and has brought to that company all the skill and experience acquired through years of association with the drama.

Kinemacolor showed the first picture of the Exposition, in their prettily appointed theatre on Monday. During the week, its program included: "Other People's Children," a comedy; "Amongst the Philippines," scenic; "Sunsets of Egypt"; "The Scarlet Letter"; and other notable products.

The General Film Company had arranged a complete program for the week embracing "The Mothering Heart," Biograph; "Hannegan's Harem," Pathe; "The Girl and the Gangster," Kalem; "How Did It Finish?" Edison; "The Black Countess," Pathe; "Penalty of Crime," Lubin; "Tapped Wires," Essanay; "In the Midst of the Jungle," Selig; "The Late Mr. Jones," Vitagraph.

These were all shown during the week, and many others, all claimed to be pre-releases.

The Mutual and Universal corporations were also a great center of attraction for the thousands who visited their theatres, located on the Forty-sixth street side of the mezzanine floor. Many important films were shown, among which, "Ashes," one of the most recent of the Reliance offerings; "Truth in the Wilderness," an American; a screaming comedy, "One Round O'Brien," Majestic; an artistic and beautiful arrangement of "Tannhauser," by the Thanhouser Company; and representative productions by Keystone, Broncho and Kay-Bee, all attracting record-breaking crowds during the week, who were loud in praise of the merit shown in all of the productions.

Messrs. Saltzman and Dibble, who motored down from Herkimer, N. Y., in company with their manager, C. H. Skinner, now of Syracuse, were much in evidence in and about these displays and the trade booths in general, getting pointers for their new and beautiful theatre at Herkimer which is now in course of construction, and will be finished in October.

Tuesday the magnificent steamer Adirondack, laden to the guards with visiting delegates, gracefully glided away from Pier 32, North River, for a sail up the beautiful Hudson as far as West Point, as guests of Pathé Fréres.

A brief rainfall dampened the spirits of the visitors and drove them into the spacious salons of the handsomely appointed vessel for a short period, but the skies soon cleared, and all sought the upper deck, where a picture was taken. It was a delightful trip, and when the steamer docked a jolly, well pleased flock of delegates and their friends sought seclusion until the morrow, in their several hotels.

Among those who attended the outing were several members of the Executive Staff, and stars of this notable organization. Miss Bessie Emick, Miss Gwendolin Pates, Paul Pantzer, Leo Wharton, William Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Burst, and others. The one representative of a moving picture paper in attendance was Alfred H. Saunders, of the Moving Picture News. To name the delegates and visitors in full is impossible, through lack of space; to particularize might give offense to some.

The most anxiously awaited of all exhibits at the Exposition, was the "screen artists" in their proper persons.

During the week, the several booths of the General Film Company, the Mutual, Universal and Kinemacolor, were fairly beseiged by an anxious expectant mob all eager to get a glimpse of their favorite.

John Bunny, who appeared early in the week, was fairly mobbed by the vast concourse who surrounded him at all times, and fairly fought for the privilege of shaking his hand.

Maurice Costello, too, was much in evidence. The man whose presence on the screen, is always a signal for murmurs of admiration, both, on account of his superb acting and magnetic personality.

Charles Kent, admittedly one of the most thorough and talented actors of the English speaking stage, long before the Motion Pictures claimed him as a brilliant exponent of the silent drama.

Tefft Johnson and William Shea, whose long service is proof positive of their popularity with the patrons of the moving picture theatres.

James C. Young and Clara Kimball Young.

Dimpled and ever smiling Lillian Walker was greeted with a shower of carnations, by beautiful Rosemary Theby, as the dimpled Lillian passed the Mutual booth, where Edgena De Lespine, Norma Phillips, Virginia Westbrook, Bobbie Robbins, Paul Scardon and others, were conspicuous during the week.

Edith Storey, another name to be reckoned with, when it comes to naming favorites.

Another great crush was encountered every day in and around the Universal booth, where Barbara Tennant, of the Eclair forces, appeared to be the favorite. Miss Tennant was closely pressed for "stellar" honors by the adaptable Jane Gail, who shines with equal brilliance in comedy and emotional work.

Other stars in the Universal firmament who shed their beams on those in attendance were: Claire and Violet Messereau, Mildred Bright, Julia Stuart, a prominent satellite in the dramatic "sky" of a decade ago; Natalie Wakefield, Clara Horton.

Among the male contingent, laughing Billy Quirk, handsome Irving Cummings, Howard Missimer, and John Steppling, repeatedly halted the moving mass while they indulged in sidewalk conversation over the doings of Frank Dayton, Francis Bushman, and other favorites of the Essanay Company, since Howard left that splendid organization.

Theo Wharton, now a director in charge of the new Essanay studio at Ithaca, N. Y., who dates back to early Biograph days, when Theodore wrote the scenarios at "ten" per, for Wallace McCutcheon.

On Wednesday night, that much traveled marvel of cleverness, who possesses talent akin to genius, Miss Gene Gauntier, held a reception in the Warner Feature booth, with the coöperation of Jack Clark and her able director, Sidney Olcott. The throng, struggling to get a glimpse of this celebrated woman was so dense at times, that the police were summoned to disperse them.

Miss Gauntier has only recently completed three important features for the Warner Company: "A Daughter of the Confederacy," "Mystery of Pine Camp," and "When Men Hate," of which she is the author, and in which she appeared in the feature part.

Harry Linson, twice a veteran; in the first instance, with a record of four years in the Civil War, from '61 to '65, during which time he served with distinction in the Sixty-ninth New York Volunteers, and a four years' record with the famous Edison Company, with whom he is now enrolled.

Mr. Linson, looking like a man in the forties, is in his seventy-fourth year, strong and vigorous, and dates back in his theatrical career to the days of the old Bowery Theatre, during the days of Tom Hamblin, Robert Johnson, Edwin Eddy, Mrs. May and others. He enjoyed the "big show" immensely and remained during the entire evening.

Other visitors during the week included Fred Truesdell, Will Scherer, Alec. B. Francis, Robert Frazer and Jack Kohler.

Wednesday night, July 9, 1913, will be a memorable one in the archives of that wonderful institution in the world of the moving picture!

The Vitagraph Company.

No such demonstration has ever been seen under like conditions, as that which greeted the sixty and more players who were present during the evening.

It was Vitagraph night.

This simple announcement was alone sufficient to attract a veritable mob, which massed the aisles and openings leading to the handsomely decorated space allotted to the General Film Company.

Pennants, post cards and ribbons were distributed by the various members of this popular company as souvenirs of the occasion, and so dense and unruly did this crowd become in their mad efforts to carry away some remembrance, it became necessary to use great discretion and no little strategy, to prevent a panic which seemed inevitable. This was averted by transferring the players from the booth to the theatre on the mezzanine floor, where another reception was held, but the clamoring multitudes crowded the stairs and entrances leading to the theatre, making them unpassable until finally the favorites were forced to disperse in several directions in order to disintegrate the crowd.

A supper was served later in the evening, among those present being: Maurice Costello, Charles Kent, John Bunny, Flora Finch, Lillian Walker, Tefft Johnson, James Young, Clara Kimball Young, Earle Williams, Edith Storey, Rose Tapley, Ralph Ince, Robert Gaillord, Mrs. Mary Maurice, William Shea, and others prominent among the popular Vitagraph Company.

W. T. Rock, president of the Vitagraph Company, was present, accompanied by his wife and son, J. B. Rock.

"Kaybee," "Broncho" and "Keystone," will be a lasting memory to the vast throng who besieged the Mutual booth Thursday evening. These representative brands of film whose trade mark when shown invariably occasion marked enthusiasm, were "publicized" by Mr. Bert Ennis, while the distribution of souvenirs was under the supervision of Miss Mae Kenny, personal secretary to Messrs. Kessel and Bauman, two names to be conjured with in the world of filmdom.

Friday night the General Film Company's booth was turned over to the famous Edison Company, the event being made a notable one in the history of the Exposition, through the presence of that "wizard" in the world of science and mechanics, Thomas A. Edison in person.

Accompanied by his wife and daughter, Mr. Edison was comfortably installed as the feature attraction at the booth shortly after 8.30. From that time every aisle, every means of approach was blocked and it was impossible to even get a glimpse of this world famous man.

Mary Fuller was next to arrive, and it was with great difficulty that a passage way was cleared for her entrance. This was a signal for renewed interest, and the vast throng increased until the crush became so dense it was deemed advisable to "divide the attractions," so Mr. Edison was with much trouble, hustled to the Edison booth, followed by a clamoring mob that was almost a riot.

Miss Fuller became active in distributing the souvenirs, assisted by Mabel Trunelle, Gertrude McCoy, Bliss Melford, Bessie Learn, Elsie McLeod, Edna May Hamel and Kathleen Coughlin were afforded great amusement, watching the mad efforts of the assembled crowd, scramble for the souvenirs they threw among them.

The executive heads: C. H. Wilson, vice-president; Nelson C. Durand, third vice-president; L. C. McChesney, advertising manager; Horace H. Plimpton, manager of negative production; John Hardin, assistant manager, were present during the entire evening, and at eleven o'clock officials and players were the guests of Mr. Plimpton, at a delightful little affair, with refreshments at the Knickerbocker Hotel.

A grand double attraction graced the General Film booth, Thursday night.

The house of Lubin and the Maison de Pathé.

The popularity of the product of these two companies is too well known to require comment.

Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe, of the Lubin forces, led all others in the competition for popularity, while Crane Wilbur and Pearl Sindelar, of Pathé, received much attention.

Sigmund Lubin, the head and front, and most important in individual control, of all those engaged in the art, entered the hall, at nine o'clock.

Following in the wake of this big-hearted, generous, liberal-minded man, were his "children" of the immense Lubin industry, some of whom have been with him for years.

He was accompanied by Ira M. Lowry and Charles Goldsmith, two of his most able lieutenants, who assisted in receiving the immense throng gathered around the booth, to greet their favorites.

Popular among the visiting artists were recognized: Harry C. Myers, Charles Brandt, Peter Lang, Edwin Carewe, Clarence Elmer, George E. Reehm, Walter H.

Stull, Robert Burns, Edgar Jones, Miss Florence Hackett (Mrs. Arthur Johnson), Miss Daisy Evans, Mrs. Peter Lang.

Representing the Producing Department were Joseph Smiley, Barry O'Neill and George Nichols, to whose valued efforts the present standard of excellence of the Lubin brand is largely due.

As we delve into this gigantic theme, the subject assumes inexhaustible proportions, but the generous response to the call for coöperation was so liberally answered we feel it incumbent not to allow anything to pass notice.

All the way from Chicago came those two representative companies, the Selig and Essanay.

Saturday night at the General Film booth, players and executive heads of both of these companies held sway, until the final moment; the immense throng clamoring to greet their favorites and when the time arrived to disperse, slowly and reluctantly moved away.

Ben Zerr, of the handsome Schuylkill avenue theatre, Reading, Pa., accompanied by Mrs. Zerr and their twelve-year-old son, were late comers.

Mr. Zerr imparted the information that his visit was more in search of knowledge for improved conditions than junketing, so he remained in close touch with everything new and novel offered at the various booths.

He told quite a good story on Master Zerr.

Passing the Herald Square Theatre in a taxi the elder Zerr saw a feature advertised; wishing to view it, he signaled the chauffeur to stop. In company with Mrs. Zerr he dismounted. Master Zerr remained seated and was interrogated by his father:

"Aren't you coming?" asked Zerr the elder.

To which the lad replied:

"No, pop! Broadway is moving picture enough for me. It's got all the feature films in the world cooked to a frazzle."

All of which goes to prove that Master Zerr is a young gentleman of discernment.

Petite and captivating Mary Alden, in private life Mrs. Wray Physioc, was an attendant during the entire week accompanied by her clever husband.

A train of admirers followed in her wake wherever she appeared, and her beautiful gowns attracted universal attention.

Mr. Physioc is the youngest and most ambitious of all manufacturers, and there is no department of a plant he's not thoroughly in touch with. He but recently resigned as general manager of the "Ramo" Company, of which he was the founder, to enter upon a more ambitious project in the industry.

Henry J. Brock, of Toronto, appeared for a brief moment on Wednesday, and after expressing regrets, that important engagements demanded his presence elsewhere he sorrowfully departed.

Diminutive, but aggressive, "Jeff" Dolan made his presence felt on several occasions during the session, by declaring that he still lives and is the smallest representative of the big feature game, and is with the Selig Feature Film Company.

Awed by the thrilling impression made by the grandeur of the Exposition, Murray F. Beier, of the Embry Feature Film Company, purchased the latest of the Itala's offerings, "The Death Knell."

Louis H. Aoto, of the Kitsee Talking Pictures, was present on several occasions extolling the merits of the Kitsee Company as was Bernard M. Corbett, prominent in the sales department of the Enterprise Optical Company of Chicago.

All "dolled up" in Bowery rags and the "omnipresent," vari-colored hat band, with bow behind on his ninety-eight cent straw, broken nosed Kennedy, a pioneer advance man, looking like a prize pug at a bench show several points off was much in evidence during the final days.

It is said Mr. Kennedy contemplates a bolt from the legitimate ranks for the more substantial field of the motion picture.

Henry Mattoni, an inventor of international fame, and one of the most skilled photographers in the country, visited the Exposition several days in succession. Mr. Mattoni found the trades exhibit most interesting, and spent most of his time examining the various improvements and innovations in the camera. He is a nephew of the late Heinrich Von Mattoni, of the famous Carlsbad Mineral Water Springs, Austria, is entitled to the prefix "Baron," but prefers to be known as Henry M. Mattoni.

Mr. Mattoni has sent to the "Union pour la securité" society, Paris, designs of his patented invention of a safety device for aeroplanes for which are offered several hundred thousand francs in competitive prizes.

The Screen Club to the number of forty and more, made "Rome howl" in and around the building Thursday night as though envious of the Famous Players announced reception and dance at their studio in West Twenty-sixth street.

And now to the exhibitors.

Beginning with the world famous Eastman Kodak Company, in charge of Mr. Blair, whose display of photographic supplies was most interesting and instructive, the attention of the visitor was next directed to the National Cash Register Company, where all of the latest improved inventions of that great industry were exhibited. This company also occupied theatre number 3, on the mezzanine floor.

There were several styles of automatic ticket selling devices, notably the Automatic Cash Register and Ticket Company, the Automatic Coin Cashier Company, Bausch and Lomb who carry a complete line of lenses for projecting and photographic purposes. The American Theatre Curtain and Supply Company. Their gold fibre screen was exhibited to great advantage in one of the theatres.

Bell and Howell, whose printers, perforators and dark room supplies are in universal use, and are deemed by many the best in the market.

The Berry and Wood Piano Company, Ernest Brecker and Rudolph Wurlitzer represented the manufacture of mechanical musical instruments.

The Motion Picture Center Company, Inc., handling everything in the field of the moving picture. The Mai. Lattan Slide Company, said to be the most extensive manufacturers of slides in the world. The H. Genter Company, manufacturer of the famed "Mirroroide" screen. The H. W. Johns-Manville Company, whose asbestos booths and curtains are in universal use. An attractive series of arc lamps were shown by Koerting and Mathieson, while a complete line of frames for lobby display were exhibited at Monger and Rings. The Nicholas Power Company exhibited one of the most interesting displays of improved projecting machines of the Exposition.

Air purifier companies were represented by the Ozone Company and the Spray Company.

One of the most extravagant and cleverly arranged displays, one that attracted universal notice, was that of the Precision Machine Company. It is difficult to interest people in mechanical devices, but the Precision Company's booth attracted great attention.

Lithography was adequately shown by the United States Lithograph Company, the Miner Lithograph Company, The Morgan and others prominent in the trade.

The Lang Manufacturing Company, the Whyte Whitman Company were largely in evidence.

The Novelty Slide Company offered one of the most artistic and beautiful displays of colored slides shown at the Exposition.

Personally attended by Mr. Coufal, their booth was thronged each day of the convention and marked results were attained. The Novelty Company carry over seven hundred designs of stock announcements, from "Welcome," to "Good Night," on beautifully colored glass or indestructible brass.

And now we come to one of the most novel attractions of the Exposition. An attraction that will be imitated and copied we venture to predict in all future gatherings of like nature. We refer to the competition for supremacy in the art of portraying emotions without the aid of words.

Several reviewers were inclined to be facetious and could only see the ludicrous side, which is not at all strange, in view of the fact that many persons of disorganized mentality are prone to forget that all things must have a beginning.

One writer, under the caption "Use No Hooks" referred to a prize of one hundred dollars. No such prize was offered.

He next referred to the committee. There was no committee.

It was clearly stated by Mr. Frank E. Samuels, the secretary of the Exposition (unharmoniously referred to as the "Spieler") that the gentlemen who sat within the enclosure were the judges appointed by the chairman of the committee, Mr. Alfred H. Saunders.

In view of these several facts it is most evident that the gentleman's first efforts at descriptive writing were even more crude than the worst efforts of the most impossible novice who appeared among the number who struck him so funny.

We would further advise that in the future when called upon to report an event of like nature or any other that he seek authenticity by enquiry, employ the services of an interpreter, or use an ear trumpet.

And now to our muttons.

Good acting! Bad acting! Is a matter of individual opinion.

Of the eighty and more competitors who were entered during the week to qualify, more than forty per cent were pronounced adaptable for motion pictures, by the consensus of opinion of the several judges presiding at various times among whom were recognized Theodore M. Wharton, director, Essanay Company; Wray Physioc, late general manager Ramo Film Company; Eppes W. Sargent, Moving Picture World; Walter R. Early, Morning Telegraph; Alfred H. Saunders, Moving Picture News.

We present below a number of the names of the competitors, with brief analyses.

Edgar A. De Pauw, 135 Clermont avenue, Brooklyn. Excellent photographic possibilities, fair ability; would be available, under direction, but requires disciplining.

Henrietta Lande, 600 West One Hundred and Eighty-third street, New York. Has temperament, could be used under direction for young girls or ensemble work.

Edward C. Colebrook, 751 East One Hundred and Fifty-fifth street, New York. Available, under direction, for ensembles and small parts.

S. Leon, Novelty Slide Company, was among the winners at the semi-finals, but did not appear at the finals. Splendid possibilities, under direction, for character comedy.

MISS DORIS KEYES

Winner Second Prize Ladies' Would Be Actor's Contest.

James O. Grady, 161 West Thirty-sixth street. Good type, available with direction for small parts and ensemble work.

Philip Benza, 172 East One Hundred and Sixth street, New York. Splendid showing. Excellent type, for characters and heavies. Will make more than good, under direction.

Samuel Lubelfield, 2252 Croton avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Impossible for motion pictures in every particular.

Leon Ottenberg, 560 Quincy street, Brooklyn. "A Type." Would make good in ensembles and small character parts under direction.

James A. Smith, 19 West One Hundred and Sixteenth street, New York. Good subject for photography, splendid possibilities, for juveniles and light comedy, under direction.

Joseph Barker, 174 West Eighty-ninth street. Possible, under direction, for small parts.

Mrs. Charles E. Riesse, 584 East One Hundred and Sixty-seventh street, New York. Available, under direction, for comedy. Would photograph well.

William Best, 1053 Park avenue. Not adaptable for motion pictures.

J. B. Feinberg, Lyric Theatre, Du Bois, Pa. Would pass, under direction, for minor juveniles.

Sol. Pulver. 109 East One Hundred and Sixth street, New York Not adaptable for motion pictures.

Eberhard Schneider was among the competitors Wednesday afternoon, and disclosed ability that rendered him adaptable and entitled to the first prize. But his identity was subsequently disclosed, and he was declared a "Ringer." so he was unanimously disqualified.

Miss Florence Allen. 129 West One Hundred and Third street, New York, was among the first to show latent ability, splendid temperamental qualities and an adaptable personality. She was unanimously awarded the first prize among the lady competitors, twenty dollars.

Miss Estelle Abeles, 2550 Seventh avenue, New York, was not impressive.

Geo. Beak, 633 West One Hundred and Fifteenth street, showed adaptable qualities, under direction, as did L. J. Solin, 37 West One Hundred and Fourteenth street; Wm. Goldberg, 33 West One Hundred and Fourteenth street; Benj. Meyer, 811 West One Hundred and Seventy-Eighth street; A. J. Allen, 277 Tremont street, Boston; B. Gilbert, 275 East Kinney street, Newark, N. J. All adaptable for juveniles, in minor parts, and ensembles.

Stella Pincus, 964 Third avenue; Pauline Ettinger, 145 West Forty-fifth street, showed cleverness and adaptability for young girls.

Miss Helen Stroock, Hotel Bon Ray, Madison avenue and Ninety-second street, would possibly have been among the winners, had she been present at the finals, as she showed early in the competition splendid qualifications, physically and temperamentally.

George H. Heydeman, 153 Second avenue, New York, was one of the most convincing of all of the male competitors; he failed also, to show at the finals, and lost an opportunity seldom offered, for admission to the ranks of motion picture actors.

Robert Walters, care of Dick Brothers & Co., Waldorf Astoria, is an excellent type for juveniles; would photograph well, and shows great promise. He was among the best of the many competitors.

Miss Evelyn York, Martha Washington Hotel, showed a most adaptable personality, splendid temperament; with some training under capable direction, could be made available for leading emotional work.

Alfred R. De Jonghe, 17 West One Hundred and Eighth street, New York, who was awarded the first prize of twenty dollars to the male competitors, showed wonderful adaptability. He has an excellent presence, a convincing manner, and easily proved himself entitled to first honors among the men.

Miss Estelle Smith, 622 West One Hundred and Thirty-sixth street, was among those deemed worthy of stellar honors among the ladies competing, but unfortunately through a misunderstanding, she did not appear at the finals until too late. Miss Smith has a delightful personality, and is adaptable for motion picture work.

Miss Anna R. Shoemaker, 4403 Eighteenth avenue, Brooklyn, showed unmistakable promise with a pleasing personality and, under direction, would doubtless become popular on the screen.

Mr. John McCann was the fortunate winner of the second prize among the male competitors.

It was Mr. McCann's first showing, and by a lucky chance, he took the place of one of those absent from the final competition. Mr. McCann proved himself more than worthy and was unanimously awarded the second prize.

Miss Turner, a petite and pretty young lady, from Newark, ran a close race with the winning contestants. Miss Turner possesses every qualification for screen purposes, being exceedingly pretty and resourceful. She made many friends among the numbers who saw her work.

No, we have not forgotten Miss Doris Keyes, of 215 Manhattan avenue, for her beauty is of such rare and delicate type to forget would be impossible.

Tall, dark and sinuous, with a figure of remarkable grace, the moment she stepped upon the platform her magnetic presence seemed to cast a spell over those present, and held their attention until the close of her effort, when she retired midst deafening applause.

Miss Keyes only succeeded in capturing the second prize, but it was a close race between Miss Allen and herself for supremacy.

Another exquisite subject for camera purposes, was beautiful Helen Adams, of 555 West One Hundred and Seventy-third street. Miss Adams showed marked ability and was most favorably considered by the judges at the semi-finals, but failed to appear at the finals, until too late.

On the final night, as we emerged from the building, we gazed through the window of the café on the corner. There we recognized "Pop" Rock, the genial and popular head of the Vitagraph Company. "Pop" now; "Billy," in the old days of "Gus" Heckler, "Charley" Byrne, "Archie" Gordon, et al. "Billy" Rock of old "arenic" days. Of circus lemonade, candied pop-corn, of "flips," "heels in the mud," and "hey, Rube."

Mr. Rock was keeping watch and ward over his two "best sellers," Maurice Costello and John Bunny, while the Thanhouser "Kidlet," perched on a table gracefully wafted kisses to the crowds around the various tables, among whom were seen: Frederick Thompson, Director Vitagraph, Lottie Briscoe, Eda Clayton (Mrs. Horace Vinton), a popular emotional dramatic star of a decade ago; Daisy Erminie Evans, Mr. Reese and Mr. Jennings, and so many others, it would require "oodles" of space to chronicle.

We stood for a moment, gazed within, the revelers slowly dispersed, the lights were dimmed and the First International Exposition of the Moving Picture Art and Allied Industries, came to a close.

EXPOSITION NOTES

I left off my record of the "side events" of the Exposition in the last issue on Tuesday night; as there was so much of other matter to be crowded in, the business manager refused absolutely to allow me any more space, and so the special event of Patheday was crowded out of the last issue. Never mind, it is so good it keeps well, the Pathe excursion up the Hudson was certainly the banner day of the week. From the time of boarding the Steamer Adirondack until its return it was one full round of pleasure, and A. J. Berst, the host, seemed to be in his element in making the guests welcome, ably assisted by H. C. Hoagland and L. E. Franconi, who saw that the wants of the guests were fully met and no one went away dissatisfied. The trip will live long in the memories of everyone who partook of the hospitality of Pathé Fréres on that Wednesday, July 9th.

The start was made shortly after 9 o'clock and the return to the dock shortly after six, was voted the most enjoyable and happy function of the week. Among those present were the following. (In parenthesis I must say I am indebted to Joe Brandt for the names):

List and wife, Frederick, Md.; Abe Seligman, New Orleans, La.; H. H. Durgin.

Personally, after this trip, I felt I had had enough of the Hudson, so did not take in the moonlight ride given by the president of the Hudson River Day Line, Mr. E. E. Olcott, on the Washington Irving, but those who took part said that the boat was the most beautiful steamer on the Hudson, that they had a most enjoyable time in this floating palace, enjoying the moving pictures that were shown for the benefit of the assembled guests. This finished Wednesday.

The next event of any importance was the visit to the Famous Players studio, where I saw produced the Belasco triumph, "A Good Little Devil," with our own "Little Mary" in a character role. The pictures were beautifully portrayed and will certainly make a furore when the time for release comes. We noticed among those making the guests welcome Mr. Daniel Frohman, Adolph Zukor, Ed. Porter and Ben Schulberg. This quartet did all that was possible to make the guests welcome, and give them a very enjoyable time. I feel I have not said enough about the four reels of "A Good Little Devil," and want to revert to it again, by saying that the pictures are an exceedingly good reproduction of the scenes of the play. I saw the play and was very much interested in it. It was very popular, and deservedly so, and I am quite sure that the featured films will have as great a success as did the play itself, and thanks must be given to David Belasco for allowing this to be filmed and giving the privilege for thousands to view so remarkable a play. In a later issue I will give full particulars and scenario of this for the benefit of my readers.

Then came Friday, when the exhibitors were guests of Vitagraph at their studio in Brooklyn; from there they went to Coney Island to feast themselves on clams and fish, and the great wonder to me is that many of them are not suffering from typhoid fever as the result. Speaking was the order of the evening, finishing up with dancing in the pavilion of Shelburne Hotel.

Coming back to the Exposition, Friday night was one of the "big nights" at the Exposition, this being Edison night at the General Film Co.'s booth, and the management acknowledged themselves indebted to the Edison Co. for one of the greatest drawing cards of the week in the person of Mr. Thomas A. Edison, who was present on that occasion. Mr. Edison, accompanied by Mrs. Edison and their daughter, Miss Madeleine, arrived about 8:45, and from the time of his arrival until his departure, about 9:30, the throng about the booth was so dense that any attempt to get through was useless.

When asked for his impression of the Exposition, Mr. Edison said, "I was delighted to find, in this first International Moving Picture Exhibition, a dawning realization of my own vision, when, several years ago, I showed to the world the moving picture. The enthusiastic interest of the great crowd which attended the exposition on the night which, I am proud to say, bore my own name, was a striking and inspiring example of the tremendous grip which the moving picture, as an entertainer and educator, has upon the great mass of the people. I rejoice to see it so."

Among the officials of the Edison Co. who attended were: Mr. C. H. Wilson, vice-president and general manager; Mr. William Maxwell, Mr. L. C. McChesney, Mr. N. C. Durand, Mr. F. K. Dolbeer, and Mr. Horace G. Plimpton.

The following directors and picture players were also present: Mr. C. Jay Williams, Mr. Charles M. Seay, Mr. Ashley Miller, Mr. Walter Edwin, Mr. George Lessey, Mr. Richard Ridgely, Miss Mary Fuller, Miss Mabel Trunnelle, Miss Alice Washburn, Mr. William Bechtel, Mrs. Laura Erskine, Miss May Abbey, Miss Gertrude McCoy, Miss Elsie MacLeod, Miss Bessie Learn, Miss Bliss Milford, Miss Edna Flugrath, Miss Clara Adams, Miss Edna May Hamel, Miss Helen Coughlin, Mr. William West, Mr. Augustus Phillips, Mr. Ben F. Wilson, Mr. Edward O'Connor, Mr. Barry O'Moore, Mr. Richard Neil, Mr. Richard Tucker, Mr. Edward Bouldon, Mr. Arthur Housman, Mr. Frank A. Lyon, Mr. Dan Mason, Mr. Jules Reed. Last but not least, our good friend, John Hardin.

Saturday night was the surprise night for Essanay and Selig, when Stan. Twist was in his element giving out puzzles, punch, and vanity cases, which were eagerly snapped up by the ladies. The greatest regret was expressed that the Exposition had been brought to a close. I am dealing more fully with this phase of the question in my editorial.

OFFICIAL NUMBER

Notice is hereby respectfully given that owing to the fact that there are four vacancies in the office of the New York State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America which leaves the executive committee without a quorum, a convention is hereby called to meet on Monday, Aug. 11, 1913, at such place and as may be hereafter designated for the purpose of electing officers to fill such vacancies. R. L. Macnabb, National first vice-president; approved, M. A. Neff, National president; George H. Wiley, National secretary.

Jacob Berg, of the Supreme Feature Film Co., has returned from Europe, and states that the Supreme Feature Film Co. will soon have a surprise for the exhibitors.

At present "Satan," for which they have the state rights for New York State, North and South Dakota and Minnesota, is still making a big hit wherever shown.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Not So Bad

WRITING for a living is not so bad as it is painted. We are going to publish a little inside information anent some well-known writers as a sort of encouragement to the picture playwright who may some time get a larger remuneration than the usual $25 per, and be classed with the "regulars." Irwin S. Cobb gave up newspaper work because he can make $15,000 a year writing stories. Lincoln Steffens, the original muckraker, was a city editor not so many years ago. Recently he invested $35,000 in newspaper stock. Charlie Van Loan was reporting a street car strike in Philadelphia when an idea for a short story came to him. He wrote it and sold it. At the end of the following year he was netting about $15,000 for baseball fiction. Robert W. Chambers makes about $40,000 a year. George Randolph Chester averages at least $20,000 yearly. One young man we know, works one week in three and averages $350 a month. Another has done his $100 weekly for five years.

They are representatives of a large class of writers who sell stuff to the lesser magazines and depend on quantity of output for their income. The moment they make a lucky serialization or dramatization their income runs into alluring figures. One picture playwright we know used to add $40 every week to his income by writing dime novels (not for moving picture screens). Another "novelizes" three plays a year at an average price of $500 each. And so it goes, active and former newspaper men, nine out of ten, and all in the literary treadmill. Speed the day when the field of picture play writing opens like possibilities for the hard worker.

Would Rather Send a Check

Richard D. Armstrong, script editor of the American Film Mfg. Co., would rather send a check than a rejection slip. He has been up against the game himself, and for many moons has been fruitlessly endeavoring to secure the return of a crucifix that helped win the Powers prize contest for Armstrong. He even feels cross when you mention the occurrence—but that is another story.

Editor Armstrong sends in the following from Santa Barbara:

> "Since completing the new studio American is now ready to consider any class of story with the exception of Indian or military scripts. With the ocean at our front door, the mountains at our back, and with background suggestive of the old world and the 15th century, particularly, we are ideally located. Costume plays of all kinds, railroad or sea stories, Western or society drama, good light comedy of the better class (nothing slap-stick) in fact, everything but the above two exceptions will be carefully considered. Good two-reel drama is especially desired at this time and we will pay good prices for the right kind of material. Contributors will receive prompt and courteous attention on all manuscripts submitted and encouraged in every way to submit their best efforts to us. I want all contributors to know that we are as anxious to buy meritorious work as they are to write and dispose of their scripts. I am much better pleased to send a check than a rejection slip."

Now, here is a courteous editor, a generous company, and a good market. Get busy!

It Was Expected

Replying to our letter asking for detailed information anent the "Photoplaywrights Association of America," inaugurated in the Photoplay Magazine, Mr. Kenneth G. Cloud, manager, says what we have to say is no more than he expected. Mr. Cloud writes: "We believe in the movement, are confident the proposition is a good one, and have nothing whatever to hide or disguise in connection with it." He says supplementary information will soon be furnished. As we stated previously, we are open to conviction and do not mean to intimate that the "Association" is not started in good faith. We have complimented the new issue of the Photoplay Magazine because the issue is deserving and we hope for its success. However, we do not think that any supplementary information will convince us of the advisability of "one dollar membership fees" in photoplaywright "associations." It stands to reason that a member who pays a dollar and who may submit ten or a hundred or a thousand scripts in a year will not get expert criticism on them by "a staff of competent editors." Competent editors cannot work for nothing. If the profit is to come from $5 or $10 revisions the announcement should so state. We have been in the script-writing business for many years and "membership fees" and "associations" do not appeal to us at all.

They Should Worry

You should not worry if Edison has held a script for five weeks. It's a sign that the story is being seriously considered. This in reply to an anxious author.

Wish Farces Only

Reed Heustic is the new script editor for Keystone. Recently he sent this statement to an author: "We never deviate from farces. Script synopsis for us will be sufficient."

Typewritten Revisions

A script writer discovered a little something for himself the other day. He found it was much easier to discover discrepancies, etc., in reviewing typewritten copy.

He had been writing his stuff with pencil, revising the written copy, and sending the final copy to a typist. His scripts came back with startling regularity. Now he thinks he has discovered a vital weakness. He rented a typewriter of his own, and instead of revising his scripts in longhand he typed them and revised the typewritten copy. He finds the real changes come in studying typewritten copy, and he can spy the little things that went unnoticed in the longhand script.

What Does He Mean?

An Iowa beginner received notice the other day that his script was "impossible." "What does he mean?" queries the Iowa man. The editor means just what he says. If a script is "impossible" it's a "derned bad" sort of script and you had better forget it. Probably this script was written with pen and ink and on both sides of note paper.

For the Love of Mike!

For the love of Mike, how often must we reiterate the advice to "leave schools alone." After a year's campaigning along comes this one: "Would you advise me to take a school course? I took my best play, which is as good as many I see on the screen, pinned a two-dollar bill to it and sent it to Mr. Thomas at his Cleveland address for criticism. What do you suppose he did, he returned my money and said he couldn't honestly give me criticism on my play that would be of benefit as it was not worthy of criticism. I should think anyone would take money and give advice for it. Would the schools return my money also?" A school was never known that would return anybody's money. Be your own schoolmaster. Mr. Thomas did just what any other honest man would do. He probably appreciated that you would not succeed as a script writer in a thousand years, and could not honorably retain your money. You will find others doing likewise, but they are not with the schools. And another thing: Don't write plays as good as you see on the screen. Write 'em better!

Pertinent Pointers

An editor does not like to receive manuscript, the pages of which are fastened together with a pin. If the pin happens to stick in his thumb it helps him to decide at once what to do with the communication.

And above all do not write the poetical script. We got one the other day in blank verse. The typewriter had one of those two-color ribbons and the typists overmarked the red one.

Don't become vain after selling a script or two. There are too many examples of inordinate egotism as it is. They only incite laughter among the elect—and sometimes they incite laughter among the elect—and sometimes they incite contempt.

When we urge every beginner to purchase some standard text-book on picture play writing, we expect another attack from the Los Angeles faker who seems to have a chronic grouch. However, we recommend Sargent's and Leed's Technique to beginners. Mr. Sargent will shortly have a de luxe volume from the presses. Buy one.

Keystone is paying $15 to $20 for the idea alone. The shorter the synopsis the better for Keystone. They will consider synopsis only. Keystone wants the "punch" without the spike.

A series of incidents is not a pictureplay. There must be a good lusty situation with incident written around it. A man walking down the street is action all right, but if he does something unusual while walking you have incident and action.

There is no such thing as an original plot. A theme may be entirely new to you but old to hundreds of thousands of others. All plots are ancient at the conception. What makes them salable is a new twist or situation. We read a script the other day that was highly recommended to us. It was very like the plot of the opera "Gypsy Love." Yet the author never saw "Gypsy Love." The plot was new to this particular writer, yet old to others. Some writers appear to believe that when a plot leaves their hands it is likely to be stolen in the first office where it is received. This is the wrong idea. But many times, some other writer has hit upon your pet plot and situation first.

Here's the way to prepare your script. Use a typewriter. Set down your title, then your cast of characters. Use a short cast. Next give a synopsis of the story in narrative form not to exceed three hundred words. Make the synopsis appeal. Put brains and thought into it. Then write your script proper giving each scene in order in which it should appear on the screen. Number them in figures and consecutively. The form of writing a scene should be brevity itself. For example: Interior editorial office. Editor opens and reads letters. Tears his hair, dashes some letters into waste basket. Runs letter carrier downstairs. Grabs a pipe and smokes up in despair, etc. (incidentally, it should be explained that this is a scene in our office when the editor gets a sackful of giddy letters about handsome actors, correspondence schools, scripts to revise—and which are not wanted, etc., etc.) To continue: Insert subtitles needed to add clearness. Don't use up five thousand words writing your script. Maybe you can do it better in five or six hundred. WM. LORD WRIGHT.

THE SCAPEGOAT

(America Release, July 28th)

John Fordyce, the bank clerk, stood at the side of his fiancée; a blush of shame spread over his countenance at the mockery of the happiness of Beauty Van Sant, who had confided in him and had added her meagre savings to his so that they might start life right.

The bank book looked all right—it was in his name with all entries on the left hand side, deposits all of them and no withdrawals. But he knew the whole thing was a forgery and he did not deserve her confidence.

This money, almost a thousand and considerable additional of the bank's funds had gone in an effort to realize quick returns on the stock market.

His defalcations were detected by Alwyn Jasper, another clerk at the bank, who, like himself, had appropriated funds of the bank. Jasper was also in love with Beauty Van Sant, but had lost out. He now offers to make good the shortage and by innuendo suggests that John is not worthy of Beauty's affections. Thus he gains the upper hand and John always feels that Alwyn is a friend indeed.

John confesses his crime to Beauty, extols the virtues of Alwyn and insists upon breaking the engagement.

Jasper wooes and wins Beauty and success and happiness seem assured when the hand of fate takes their only child.

In the meantime Jasper has covered one shortage by a greater misappropriation and things are nearing a climax. He cleverly weaves a case of circumstantial evidence against John Fordyce and the latter, at first highly indignant, denies the charges, but later, in doubt as to the outcome of any defence he might make, pleads guilty and is sentenced to five years of penal servitude.

Alwyn Jasper meets with an accident, the result of which is fatal, but before death he makes a confession complete, by vindicating John.

Beauty seeks the prison and John to make restitution, but Fordyce has already been liberated. Her untiring efforts to find John are finally rewarded when she recognizes in a total wreck at a Rescue Mission the man who had made such noble sacrifices for her.

The two are reconciled and the silver lining of the heavy clouds of the despair of years scintillates all the brighter.

THE FRESE CAMERA

The Frese Cinematograph camera, a new product of California manufacture, made its first Eastern appearance last week at the Exposition in the booth of Rice & Einstein, of Berkeley, Cal.

With its many unique features and sturdy construction, it was quick to win the enthusiastic approval of the scores of camera men who visited the booth to inspect the two models on display. The one feature that appealed perhaps more than any other to the camera men who have much "dissolve" and other trick work to do, is the simple reversing device by means of which the film may be reversed without changing any belts, cranks or gears. This is accomplished with a single spring belt that runs over both the upper and lower take-up pulleys. The latter are provided with ratchets so arranged that when the crank is turned forward the lower pulley operates its magazine and the upper pulley remains idle. When the crank is turned backward the lower pulley becomes idle and the upper one operates so as to wind the film into the upper magazine. This feature is extremely convenient in all studio trick work.

A handy feature of the Frese camera is its sliding aperture plate which allows of framing by the mere turning of two eccentric screws. This makes it possible to expose film so as to have the division line between pictures wherever desired with relation to the perforations.

Extreme simplicity and accessibility are claimed for the camera. Any part of the mechanism may be reached easily and instantaneously. On the crank side of the camera is a removable panel which gives access to all of the principal gears.

Focusing is accomplished through the side of the camera, where a sliding tube and a 45-degree mirror give a square view of the aperture. This has the advantage over the rear focusing tube of allowing the operator to see the image at much shorter range. It also saves considerable space in the camera, permitting four hundred foot magazines in the same size box that is usually equipped with magazines of smaller capacity.

A great convenience and time saver is the pair of tracks so fastened to the bottom of the camera that the camera may quickly be slipped onto the tripod and locked in place without the usual fumbling with an inaccessible thumb screw.

Carl Zeiss Tessar lenses form the regular equipment of the camera although other lenses may be specified if desired. Liberal provision is made for the small conveniences that go to make a camera complete. These include such equipment as footage register, film punch, adjustable shutter, changeable masks for keyhole and similar effects, stop motion crank, up-side-down socket, spirit level, ground-glass view finder, oil can and small tools. The view finder, crank, oil can and tools fit into brackets inside the camera, leaving no loose parts to be carried in the pockets.

The Frese Camera is being marketed by Rice & Einstein of 1932 Center street, Berkeley, Cal., who, in addition to being camera dealers are producers of educational and industrial films.

MANNING IS EASTERN REPRESENTATIVE FOR MIRROR SCREEN CO.

Frank Manning, of 922 Sixth avenue, New York City, has been appointed general sales agent for the Mirror Screen Co., of Shelbyville, Ind. Mr. Manning will be the Eastern representative for this popular screen.

Inquiries are coming in rapidly regarding "Arizona," the first product of the All Star Feature Film Company, and at their offices in the Candler Building and at the offices of Mr. Harry R. Raver in the Columbia Theatre Building there are coming numerous buyers seeking to get in "on the ground floor." Among recent callers were Ben D. Crose and Menlo Moore, respectively of Indianapolis and Chicago, and Carl S. Rothleder and J. A. Schwalm of the Imperial Feature Film Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Missoula, Mont.—The Family Theatre has opened, with Charles Freshwater as manager.

KINEMACOLOR AT EXPOSITION

"Kinemacolor considers the First International Motion Picture Exposition a great success, a much bigger crowd than anybody could have anticipated," said A. P. Bernard, president of the Kinemacolor Company of America. "Considering the fact that this is still an 'infant industry,' the number and variety of the exhibits was marvelous, and if it was impressive to those who have grown up with the business, imagine what the exposition must have been to the thousands of visitors who never before had a glimpse 'behind the screen.' Judging from the throngs that crowded the Kinemacolor Theatre at every performance and waited outside for the 'next show,' this exposition will heighten public appreciation of the art of Kinematograph and help to realize the great future which we believe is in store for it. Exhibitors cannot advance much faster than their patrons, therefore every opportunity that is given the public to see the better grade of pictures will increase the demand for them.

"Kinemacolor welcomed this opportunity to 'show goods,' and though our efforts at the exposition were mainly to entertain the thousands who had never seen the natural color motion pictures, the results are showing already at our film service. As an immediate consequence of the exposition we are going to open a new distributing station in Kansas City, Mo., to supply the demand for Kinemacolor pictures in territory that cannot be covered from our Chicago office, and the South demands a station soon. One big exhibitor has volunteered to act as Kinemacolor distributor for his own circuit of some fifteen houses so he could get films right away.

"Kinemacolor pictures usually speak for themselves, but we are very proud of one compliment they received from no less distinguished an authority than Thomas A. Edison, the father of the craft. It proves what a great man he is when he not only visits rival exhibitions, but encourages their efforts to improve the motion picture art. Indeed this seemed to be the spirit of the exposition, so it cannot be anything but beneficial to the entire trade.

A REMARKABLE DEMONSTRATION BY THE FORD MOTOR COMPANY BEFORE THE MOVING PICTURE CAMERA

The rapidity with which cars are made in the plant of the Ford Motor Company was shown recently when a gang assembled a car complete and ran it off under its own power in just two and one-half minutes.

The operation was performed for the benefit of a picture concern, and the picture will be shown throughout the country.

Under the manufacturing schedule now current at the Ford plant, a car is produced there every forty seconds, but, of course, a number of cars are being assembled at the same time.

For the motion picture machine, however, the entire operation was gone through singly. A place was cleared on the assembling floor and the camera focused. Then eight men went to work. The frame was set up, the axles placed, the motor installed, the wheels attached, the transmission connected up, the body bolted in place, all accessories, including lamps, horn, etc., fastened on properly, tank filled and the crank given a turn which started the motor as a driver took his seat. The car moved out to the loading platform in just two and one-half minutes.

A number of pictures were taken.

Mr. Hutchinson, now at the Santa Barbara studios, has secured the services of Monsieur Frederic Cavens, fencing master, who is a graduate of the Normal Military Fencing School of Brussels, Belgium, to instruct all actors of the American Company in the use of the rapier, broadsword, etc. They are rapidly becoming proficient under this skilled master and picture fans will soon see the American favorites in an entirely new and novel role, and some thrilling, picturesque and desperate swordplay. Beautiful ladies in court costumes will add to the picture charm, which will be full of deeds of daring of the picturesque Jacques le Grand.

Mr. Lorimer Johnston has started the production of a series of costume pictures entitled "The Adventures of Jacques."

Mr. Warren Kerrigan will be featured in the series which will undoubtedly prove very popular. The scenes of these pictures are laid in the Fifteenth century and the mannerisms of the period will be faithfully copied.

The Empire Brand consisting of two and three-reel naval and Puritan pictures, will be released by the N. Y. Motion Picture Corporation beginning September 1, 1913.

Mabel Normand has taken a brief respite from her strenuous duties at the Keystone Studio, and instead of falling out of aeroplanes, riding in mile-a-minute automobiles, and plunging from dizzy heights into the water, a few of the stunts which she performs in the films, Mabel is quietly resting in San Francisco on a short vacation.

William Farnum and his brother, Marshall Farnum, next week begin work on Rex Beach's masterpiece, "The Spoilers," the first of a series of famous American dramatizations for which they are booked to appear with the Selig forces.

Major Thomas J. Dixon, Chaplain of the 6th Field of Artillery, who studied the moving picture machine and became an accomplished operator in the Selig Polyscope Plant in Chicago, recently applied his knowledge with great success in catching some exceptionally interesting operations in the hunting-field in which the cavalry at Ft. Riley were engaged. Chaplain Dixon has also made some fine films of artillery going into action. These subjects will be particularly valuable as they have the real atmosphere environing our "soldier boys" and are not in any sense posed or artificial.

FEIST, OF KINEMACOLOR, TO VISIT SOUTHWEST

Felix Feist, author of "If Time Was Money, I'd Be a Millionaire," and many other popular songs, who has since devoted his talents and enthusiasm to exploiting Kinemacolor, will make an extended tour through the Southwest in the interests of the natural color motion pictures. The recent motion picture exposition resulted in so many applications for Kinemacolor service from that section of the country that it became necessary to establish a new distributing station for prompt film service. Mr. Feist will open an office in Kansas City, and thence tour Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Texas, inspecting theatres and installing Kinemacolor service in those states. Pianists and musical directors en route will please play "Senora," "Can't You See I'm Lonely" and "The Bullfrog and the Coon"—just to make Felix feel at home when he hears his own songs so far from Broadway.

Wray Physioc, of Ramo film fame, has left on a short trip to Europe. On his return he will head a newly organized company in the producing of feature films with studios at Nyack, New York.

Missoula, Mont.—The Bijou Theatre will close for ten days, during which time the house will be entirely remodeled and made into a first-class picture house.

IN THE GARDEN

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Edison Release.)

"WHAT a typical gentleman of the old school he is."

"Yes, isn't he? I am sure he must have a romance. They say he has never married."

It was a young girl and her partner who spoke as they stood resting after a dance. They were speaking of old Mr. Stevens, who sat in one corner of the room watching the dancers. He did not notice them for his attention was centered on another couple nearer to him.

"But, Dana," the girl was saying in a low tone, "you can't expect me to give up all of my men friends."

"You don't have to give them so much of your time, and you don't have to look as though you are enjoying yourself so much," grumbled the young man.

"Why, you silly boy. I am only being my natural self, and I have danced only once with each one of them so far."

The young man said something under his breath that escaped the ear of the old gentleman in the corner and turned away. The girl stood for a moment watching him as he crossed the room and disappeared. As she turned to meet her next partner there was sadness rather than anger in her eyes.

"Just like Julia. I must find him," murmured Mr. Stevens as he got up from his chair somewhat stiffly.

"You are not going yet, Mr. Stevens?" asked the hostess as she saw the old man slowly going down the steps leading into the garden. He put his finger on his lips for a moment and then spoke in a stage whisper:

"Lover's quarrel. I'm going to fix it."

"Alright," laughed Mrs. Harris, "I hope you can. Put your handkerchief over your head if it seems damp out there."

"I will." And the old gentleman carefully made his way along the garden path on his errand of peace-making.

"There he is," he said aloud involuntarily when he had gotten well into the garden. "I thought he'd come here."

"How lovely the garden is in the moonlight," ventured the old gentleman when he was near the young man sulking on a bench in a secluded corner.

"Very," he answered with cold politeness.

"Too lovely for a young man like you to be alone."

"I prefer to be alone."

"You mean to say that you wouldn't rather have one of those lovely young girls with you here?"

"I prefer to be alone."

"Well, well, the young men have not the warm blood they used to have when I was young."

The young fellow on the bench turned quickly. "I beg your pardon, sir, but I think my blood is as warm as anybody's. What's a man to do when the girl he loves cares as much for other men as she does for him?"

"Ah! So that is it. What makes you think she doesn't care for you? Did she say so?"

The young man moved a bit uneasily. "No, sir, she says she cares for me, but she dances with the other fellows too much. But why am I telling this to you?" asked the lover impatiently.

"Well, I don't know, I'm sure, but if you will let me I'll sit down here and talk to you for a while."

"Why, certainly, sir," answered the young man with almost cold politeness.

"Thank you. Thank you." Mr. Stevens spoke absently.

After a long silence he spoke again. "Do you see that cottage in the garden next door? Over there with the lilac hedge?"

"Yes."

"I live over there."

"It must be a very pretty place," the young man answered disinterestedly.

"It is beautiful but part—much of its beauty is lost for I live there alone."

"You have lost your wife? I am sorry, sir."

"I have never been married."

"Oh! Well, perhaps it is best. I'm beginning to think so, I'm sure."

The old gentleman paid no attention to the other's grumbling remark. "I've lived in that cottage for nearly fifty years. Everybody wonders why I've never married. I often hear them whispering about it. I don't mind, but I've never told any of them my story. Young man," he turned suddenly and spoke almost sharply, "I'm going to tell you what I've never told a living soul."

"Why, I feel very flattered, I'm sure."

"No, you need not feel flattered, and you need not even be polite enough to pretend you want to hear it. You probably think I'm going to bore you. I don't think so, but that doesn't matter. I have a reason and you'll know what it is by the time I'm through."

Silence fell between the two for some time. The soft light of the moon shining through the young leaves cast tiny, lacey shadows across the garden path. While the old man told his love story the night insects sang their mating songs, and now and then a happy bird twittered sleepily to his mate.

"In the year 1861," began the old gentleman, "I was twenty-nine years old. I had all that one could wish for of this world's treasures—youth, health and wealth, and a long line of fair women and brave men of the South for my ancestors. And beside all these I had love. One of the South's fairest daughters had promised to be my bride. We had been engaged for four months and were to be married in two more."

The old man sighed and the young man sat as though turned to stone.

"There were rumors of war and everybody, young and old, was in a state of excitement. The young people tried to keep up some of their usual gaiety, but it was hard work to forget the sword that hung over their heads. One night a dance was given, I think it was the last one I ever attended until I was an old man. Julia—her name was Julia; Julia and I went together. Oh, how proud of her I was. How well I remembered the light on her fair hair and the deep blue of her eyes when she came in to greet me. She was dressed so simply in white with a pale pink rose on her breast."

The voice died away and for a moment the narrator was lost in memory.

"Oh, I must go on with my story," he said with a start. "Well, we went to the dance and as we entered the large room all the young men flocked round Julia to engage dances. I tried not to show my feelings but my evening was spoiled. I turned to her and said very coldly, "I leave this to your own discretion," and left her. She seemed to notice the words alone for she turned brightly to me and said, "Thank you, Philip," just as I was leaving her.

"Like the jealous fool that I was I retired into an obscure corner and watched her as though she had been a criminal instead of the innocent thing she was. When the music started she looked for me. I remember now the love that shone from her eyes but I was too blind to see it then. At last she saw me and came swift as a bird to my corner. She said, 'Come on, dear, and I will tell you which dances I've saved for you. You haven't gotten a one, you silly boy. Just because you are engaged you needn't desert all the other girls. I don't forget the boys.'

"'No, I see you don't,' I said bitterly. 'You had better give this to some one else. I don't care to dance.'

"'Why, Philip! What do you mean?' she cried.

"'Just this, Julia; you can choose between me and the others.' With that I turned on my heel and left her standing alone."

The listener turned sharply toward the old man and seemed about to speak; but a wrinkled hand was raised and he did not do so.

"I know what a cad I was. I think I knew it then but jealousy and anger blinded me."

Away across the fields a whippoorwill called, and was answered by his mate.

"Ah, me!" sighed the old man, "everything must have its mate. A man is only half a man without his mate."

The young man stared into the shadows and did not speak.

"Well," continued the storyteller. "I went from the ballroom into the garden. There I found a group of young men in great excitement. I asked the cause and was told that volunteers from the South had been called for. A regiment was to be formed in our town that night. To hasten to the end, my boy, I enlisted that night.

"The next day we started. We had to march right past

Julia's house. She stretched out her hands to me and cried my name, but I did not make a sign.

The voice broke and for a moment was silent The young man arose and walked restlessly about in the moonlight and shadows, then returned to the seat.

"You know what the war was," the old man continued. "The agony of those days need not be repeated. But of all the suffering during the war I think none equalled that of the women waiting for their loved ones, and so many times waiting in vain."

The two men on the garden seat were conscious for the first time of the stopping of the music.

"Well," the old man said again, "the war was over at last and we all came home, sad and broken men. The anger and jealousy had died in my heart in the presence of bigger things. I longed to lay my tired head upon the bosom of the one I knew could understand and sympathize. I went straight to Julia's home. At the door I was met by her old colored mammy. I shall never forget the look of mingled pity and scorn in the face of that old negress. She looked me straight in the eyes as she said, 'Missie Julie is dade, Marse Philip. She died ob a broken heart. She tried powerful hard to wait but she couldn't.'" The old voice broke again and ceased.

Both men heard a slight rustling along the moonlit path and turned toward it. A young woman in white was coming toward them. Under the moonlight she looked like the spirit of the garden.

"Dana," called a sweet, girlish voice.

The young man turned quickly to his companion and said in a whisper, "I do see the reason for your telling me the story, and I thank you with all my heart."

"Dana."

"I am coming."

"There is only one dance more. I have saved it for you."

"In spite of what I said?"

"Yes, dear."

"Forgive me, sweetheart."

And then the old man looked away as he arose to go to his own garden, a mixture of sad memory and the thrill of young love within his lonely heart.

Editor Saunders,
Moving Picture News,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

I as an exhibitor from Montana wish to express my appreciation of Frank Donovan, the little Ramo film booster, who not only showed me around the town, and convinced me that the Mutual program was the most popular, and that Ramo films were in a class by themselves. Their feature "Man and Woman" is a corker, and me for the Mutual program soon as I get back home, and thanking my little friend again, Frankie Donovan, I beg to close with the best wishes for the exhibitor's friend, the News, which you can always find on file in my office at the theatre.

Thanking you in advance, I am

Yours truly,
WILLIAM S. SLOAN, Prop.,
Butte Opera House,
Butte, Mont.

That the day of the store-show is rapidly approaching its end is prognosticated by J. Allen of the Canadian Film Exchange of Calgary, who, accompanied by P. Kauffman, general manager of the Toronto branch of that company, was in New York during Exposition and Convention week. Substantiating this theory is Mr. Allen's own moving picture activities. He now has in course of construction at Moosejaw, Man., a $75,000 theatre to seat 1,200 people and the Allen Theatre at Calgary costing $100,000 with 1,000 seating capacity. Among the other eight theatres important because of their costliness are Mr. Allen's recently opened theatre in Regina, Sask., costing $50,000, and the Rex Theatre in Winnipeg, costing $75,000.

Sidney M Goldin has left for Mt. Clemens for a two weeks' vacation. For three months Goldin has been busy day and night preparing, producing and completing three extra features for the Universal.

The first three reel feature Goldin produced for the Universal was "The Sorrows of Israel," released on June 19th, and conceded to be one of the most stirring dramatic pictures released by this firm.

Then came "Nihilist Vengeance," a two reel Russian feature, followed by "The Heart of a Jewess."

Upon his return, Goldin will commence a special Jewish three reeler.

GLEN WHITE

Mr. Glen White, the leading man recently acquired by the Ryno Film Company, has a reputation of a most enviable nature. His career on the legitimate stage and his experience in the picture play, place him with the peers and princes of entertainers.

Mr. White appeared in Charles Frohman's "Miss Hook of Holland" as Lieutenant Dekoop and with Lew Fields' "It Happened in Nordland," following Harry Davenport, singing the famous "Absinthe Frappe" number and playing the Prince. He was also two years with Vaughan

Glaser in stock in Cleveland, Ohio, appearing with a well-known Broadway cast as William B. Mack in "Within the Law."

In his last tour of the Continent Mr. White played Gamble in the big morality playlet at the Coliseum Theatre, London.

Mr. White's career in pictures is most gratifying. He first appeared with Pathe Company, thence with the Universal, where his personality has placed him in the limelight of photoplayers. In the future Mr. White will be featured in all Ryno releases.

SIMONE OPENS OFFICES FOR VENUS FEATURES

In connection with the general management of the Centaur Film Company of New Jersey, Mr. Charles Simone is starting the Venus features with sales offices in the Candler Building. Venus features are two and three-reel American productions made in California by Harry C. Matthews and J. Farrell McDonald under the supervision of Thomas W. Evans. The first release will be "The Sleeping Beauty," a most beautiful three-reel feature, and will be sold as well as all other Venus features on the state rights plan.

Charming Elsie Albert, the well-known kid players, Matty and Early, are supported by an all-star cast.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

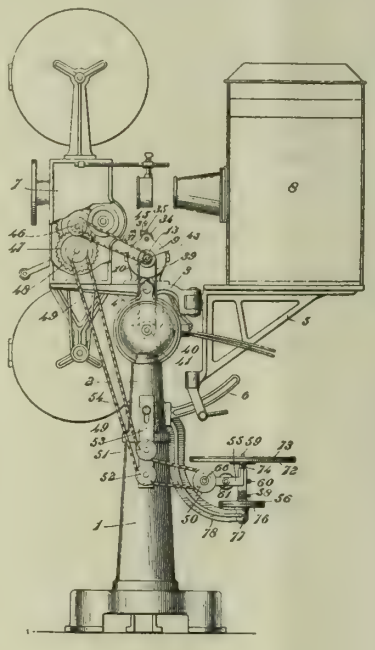
Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

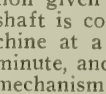
In the Patent Office, as well as among the members of the Bar practicing before it, there is sincere regret caused by the retirement of Commissioner E. B. Moore. As constituted under his able administration of this most important Bureau, conditions were unique, and unrivalled in any other civil department of the Government, in that the Commissioner, the two Assistant Commissioners, the Chief Clerk, all the Law Clerks, the Board of Examiners in Chief, and the Chief of the Classification Division, constituting the entire ranking official force of the Patent Office, were men who entered office at the lowest grade of the Examining Corps and passed through the intermediate grades to their several positions.

In fact there is no previous record of a person entering the Patent Office at the lowest grade and proceeding through intervening grades in continuous service until he reached the exalted position of Chief Executive. Thus, after long years in subordinate positions, Mr. Moore was appointed Assistant Commissioner by President McKinley in 1901, and served as such until 1907, in which year President Roosevelt appointed him Commissioner. His 12 years in executive capacity backed by his personal experience in and familiarity with all subordinate conditions and requirements, combined with his natural ability and personal qualifications, rendered his administration exceptionally acceptable to all concerned, so that he not only enjoyed the respect of his subordinates but of practicioners as well. This is largely true of his two assistants as well as of his other staff officers above enumerated. No other civic bureau of the Government exemplifies so well the operation of the Civil Service; and most fittingly so since the Patent Office not only has to deal with technical questions relating to the various arts and sciences, but with the law also, and efficiency can only be attained by long training and practical experience. Mr. Moore's tenure of the Commissionership while long as compared with that of any of his immediate predecessors, was short, however, as contrasted with that of Doctor Thornton, the first Superintendent of the Patent Office, who was appointed by President Jefferson in 1803, "to issue patents," and who continued doing so until 1827, a period of 24 years, his administration of the Patent Office being much longer than that of any of his successors. One of his associates in a letter addressed to John D. Craig in 1830, the then Superintendent of the Patent Office, said of Dr. Thornton, "He conceived himself to be invested with and exercised freely much discretionary power in the issue of patents; for he held it as a maxim, and I believe a very good one, that the patent law was made solely for the encouragement of authors and inventors and not for the collection of revenue." Congress at this late day seems to think otherwise, as with a growing balance of considerably over $7,000,000 to its credit in the U. S. Treasury, the Patent Office is so lacking in accommodations and facilities that inventors and manufacturers have to suffer extraordinary delays and inconvenience in the transaction of business with this important Bureau.

THE Camera has attained another triumph in delving into the secrets of nature. By the use of a horizontally rotatable camera, carefully timed and regulated as to motion, Alexander Larson, a student and expert laboring on behalf of the Smithsonian Institute, has been able to demonstrate that a lightning flash, instead of consisting of a single line of light as discerned by the human eye, is in reality composed of a series of rushes or streaks which follow one another at certain intervals in the path of first discharge—as many as forty distinct streaks or rushes being detected in a single flash, and the intervals between the rushes being timed with accuracy. "As quick as a flash of lightning," may still answer ordinary purposes of speech, but to indicate exceptional speed, "As quick as a streak of a flash of lightning" would now seem justifiable.

Henry Theodore Crapo, of New York, N. Y., in Letters Patent No. 1,052,324 issued to Geo. R. Webb, of Baltimore, Md., Assignee, seeks to produce a synchronous motion-picture and voice-producing machine, of which the accompanying illustration is a side elevation giving a general idea of the structure which is designed to be operated by a single motor 41. The invention has for its object to insure perfect synchronism between the motion picture representations and the vocal reproduction; to provide means under which the operation of the motion picture machine and voice reproducer may be at rest while the motor continues active; to provide means whereby motion may be transmitted from the motor to the motion picture machine and to the voice reproducer first at a relatively low rate of speed, but in synchronism, and then by a relatively higher speed, the reproduction of both corresponding to the original subject-matter. 1 designates a supporting pillar; the upper portion 2 of which is revoluble and carries a bed-plate mounted upon a shaft 4 upon which it may be rotatably adjusted, 5 designates a bracket pivotally connected with the bed-plate 3 to swing horizontally, and provided with means by which it may be locked to an arm 6 extending from the portion 2 of the pillar, and upon the bed-plate 3 and the bracket 5 are mounted the members 7 and 8 of a motion picture machine. Upon the bed plate 3 is mounted casing 9, which contains governor mechanism. By placing both moving picture device and sound reproducer device under control of the same governor-coupling which connects both devices to the same drive member, precisely the same power transmission conditions are afforded for both of the devices and each is under the influence of the same speed control derived from the governor coupling and thus uniformity of motion is maintained between the two devices. Under the illustration given the gears are so proportioned that the governor shaft is connected to the sprocket of the motion picture machine at a speed of two hundred and forty revolutions per minute, and compounded gears from its shaft operate the film mechanism projecting sixteen pictures per second or nine hundred and sixty per minute.





Why is a Cy-mo-graph? Because it affords a more simple and economical method of motion study than the motion picture camera with its yards upon yards of film, etc., even though the latter be a comparatively recent innovation in the aid of efficiency. The cy-mo-graph is a photographic record made by means of a stereoscopic camera because the two lenses of the latter for reasons well known in the art show motion toward the camera as well as across the visual range. This is the very latest development in the analysis of the travels of the hands of a worker while performing a task. The record is attained by attaching a small electric bulb to the hand of an operator by means of an insulated finger ring, or one to each hand as required; and the glow may be either continuous or intermittent. When intermittent and timed the resulting dots or dashes afford accurate means for segregating and studying intervals of the movement as well as the complete cycle. Hence, also the best records may be obtained in comparatively dark parts of the shop. An expert is enabled by a study of these photographic records, to readjust the elements of an operation, or relocate vital parts of machinery in such way as to save time and energy, and hence money, to both employer and employed. The method is also obviously adapted to the study of the motion of machine parts, and various other purposes.

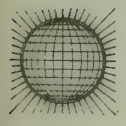
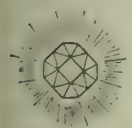
Registration No. 92,328, has been granted the Exhibitors Film Service Company, of San Francisco, Cal., for the annexed Trade Mark for films, used since October 1, 1912.



Continuing their remarkable work of two years ago, Prof. Stormer and De Birkeland spent the months of February and March at Bosekop, in Northern Norway, making photographs of the aurora. As previously, photographs have been taken simultaneously from two stations about 2½ miles apart, connected by telephone, so as to furnish means for computing the distance and altitude of the aurora.

Dussard's "cold" light is now pretty well known in the art, and elsewhere we have noted the fact that shadowgraphs have been obtained by radioactivity derived from certain coal products. Sugar, like coal, being only a modified form of carbon, we must not therefore be startled at the advent of what might be designated as "Sweet Light" derived from loaf sugar. The phenomenon, the cause of which has not yet been satisfactorily explained, was recently described at a meeting of the British Association. Discs of loaf sugar were mounted in a lathe and rapidly rotated while at the same time a hammer played lightly (?) upon them, resulting in an almost continuous radiation of light. It was shown that the light did not arise from the beating of the sugar, though light, as before intimated; and it is believed by some to be caused by the changes taking place in the sugar crystals, held by experts to be of the nature of electrical phenomena.

A folding or "knock-down" appliance for flash light purposes is the subject of Patent No. 1,065,880, issued to Luther D. Little, of Jackson, Mich., and it is designed to afford a cabinet having a screen of white muslin at the front, the device being adapted to be supported in a horizontal position directly over the front board of the camera, whereby shadows around the figures are to a certain extent eliminated, and a clear natural picture produced. The claim is for a flash-light cabinet having a bottom, side walls, a rear wall, the said walls hinged to the bottom to fold inwardly, the said walls having guides at the front edges, and a screen adapted to slide between the said guides when the cabinet is set up.



Cole-o-graphs? Investigation has accidentally been directed to certain grades of coal, particularly "pit-coal" and "channel coal" as a direct source of radioactivity, the cancerous effects of handling coal tar, crude paraffine and soot having in certain cases been found analogous to those produced by the X-ray or radium. As a test an internally black negative box was prepared, and a copper coin, a flat key and a brass letter laid on the negative. The under side of the cover was smeared with coal tar to face downward. This box was enclosed in a black japanned tin box and placed in a dark closet for 24 hours. After development the plate showed distinct shadowgraphs of the three metallic articles. The result would seem to indicate that certain kinds of coal may contain valuable radioactive substances—but whisper it not to the coal dealer; and for the present the discovery is hardly available in the Cinematographic art unless by way of scientific information.

Registration No. 92,404 has been granted the Compagnie General des Etablissements Pathé Freres (Phonographe and Cinematographe), of Paris, France, for PATHEKOK as a trade mark for apparatus for taking kinematographic pictures, kinematographic projection apparatus, screens for projections, projecting lanterns, kinematographic films and packing for said films; said mark having been used since January 10, 1913.

The first innovation of its kind in Italy was the recent installation of a cinematographic apparatus in one of the Regie Scuole Normali of Genoa for the instruction of pupils.

In this country the use of mobile pictures is advocated as a means of illustrating life in, and procuring recruits for the army. But Uncle Sam has been successfully forestalled in this respect by the Michigan National Guard. And motion pictures are now used to teach the soldier how to shoot.

However, the Children's Motion Picture League of Greater New York is the latest and greatest innovation, the best ever, and the idea is worthy of universal encouragement.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

Geo. Wm. Miatt

The Selig Special, consisting of three Pullmans, two baggage cars, a scenery car, a property car and a wild animal car, left on the Santa Fe Route last Saturday morning for the Gold Coast. John Lancaster, who is a vegetarian, took along a lot of "soup cubes," cooking his own meals in a shaving cup, and insisted upon sleeping in the baggage car instead of a palace compartment, as he played "tramp" so much he wanted to keep in the atmosphere. This excited the emulation of "Billie" Stowell, who has appeared so frequently as the faithful engineer in smash-ups, that he wanted to ride on the locomotive. The engineer, however, was a grouch, and an officer in the union. So he made the faithful "Billie" sit out on the engine tender on an upholstery of coal until his face was so stippled by hot cinders that he was glad to dip his head in the tank. He said that came natural as he once played two seasons in a "tank drama." Charley Clary, the leading man, always carried his own chair and pre-empted the place on the observation platform of the rear of the train. He had provided himself with a box of cigars, known as the "Fuma de Terror" that are twelve inches long and smoke like a house afire. He declared his enjoyment of this dissipation was truly artistic because he had long been "a fire hero." Lyllian Leighton took along her typewriter as well as her sewing as she expected to write a scenario or two en route. She really wanted to cook biscuits, but the man in the dining car said the kitchen was too small. La Fayette McKee, who used to be known as the star of the West, had been plentifully billed for all the one-night stands en route, and had provided himself with an ingenious shotproof costume, and was prepared to make speeches on the rear platform a la Roosevelt whenever he was called upon.

Frank Donovan, the former well-known juvenile star, who has been featured with such shows as "From Sing Sing to Liberty," "Brown of Harvard," "Blackmailers of New York," and other shows, stock and vaudeville, and lately with the Yankee Film Company, is now with Wray Physioc of Ramo doing press work. Frank has had newspaper experience, having been with the New York Journal for over two years, and is well liked by all who know him.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAM.
Seattle, Wash., July 12, 1913.

Motion Picture Machine Operators of New York get the charter. Battle is won.

(Signed) ROBT. GOLDBLATT.

* * * * * * *

After a struggle lasting over five years justice has been done at last at the recent convention of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees at Seattle, Wash., to the members of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 as the above telegram shows. Many thanks are due to the wonderful support given by the various delegates to the convention (including the Stage Hands, Electricians, Carpenters, etc.) who so nobly supported the delegate of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, President Robt. Goldblatt.

* * * * * * *

As an evidence the impression the recent events have upon the operators who are not members of any organization is the number of calls at the office of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 for enrollment of membership in this organization, and it is only a few days more until July 31, when the fee is raised to $50.00. "Nuf sed."

NOTICE.

All members of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 are hereby notified that on Monday, July 21, 1913, a regular and special meeting will take place at our meeting rooms at 66 Essex street at 12 p. m. All members will be fully informed on proceedings, etc., of the recent I. A. T. S. E. convention at Seattle, Wash. A full attendance of members is requested.

* * * * * * *

Our worthy President Robert Goldblatt has advised the office of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 that he will arrive in the city on Monday, July 21, and we can assure the readers of the Chat that he will get a reception such as no other in the labor movement has ever received. There certainly will be "a hot time in the old town" when he leaves the train, and believe me, that the general public will know that the boys of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will be there with the "bells on."

* * * * * * *

In conclusion we must not forget the faithful friend and brother, Alfred H. Saunders, the editor of the Moving Picture News, who so valiantly fought for the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 on all occasions by word and pen, and in addition gave the operators every chance at publicity in their fight for justice through the use of the columns of his valuable union paper, the Moving Picture News. Many, many thanks for your valuable assistance, Brother Saunders, and it sincerely is the wish of every member of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 that you may be blessed with a long life and a prosperous one.

J. A. LE ROY, Business Representative.

On Thursday, the 3rd of July, the big Edison Studio closed its doors not to reopen until Monday, the 7th. There was a general exodus headed by Manager Plimpton, who pursued the elusive golf ball about for three whole days. John Hardin repaired to his brother's home in Staten Island, and C. J. Williams, George Lessey, Augustus Phillips, Ben Wilson and other fortunate possessors of motor cars organized an Edison tour. Mr. and Mrs. Bechtel journeyed to Asbury Park, Laura Sawyer to East Hampton and William Wadsworth to Pigeon Cove, Mass. Harry Beaumont and Miss Milford, fresh from the Blue Ridge Mountains, sought the highest point in the Catskills.

Charles Seay started a safe and sane Fourth by running into a street car with his new machine. Mr. Seay lost a fender and a lamp, but was disgusted because the street car did not sustain any visible damages.

John Collins, stage manager, returned on Sunday night to find that his apartment had been entered and every article of clothing in it had been stolen. Harry Gripp came to the rescue and relieved Collins of the necessity of staying in bed.

Harry Eytinge has been seriously ill at his home, but is now back in harness and doing his usual excellent work. The portly character actor has been doing some very clever work at the Edison Studio since his return.

MISS VIVIAN RICH, LEADING LADY OF "FLYING A" COMPANY

Miss Vivian Rich's talent and unusual personality have greatly enhanced the value of the American film since she commenced to play opposite Jack Kerrigan. She is affording the leading man a deserving support and the change will soon become evident to American patrons. Playing with Kerrigan Miss Rich has secured her first important opportunity in moving pictures. With the Keystone company the conditions were not favorable to her advancement. In the work during the last month she has shown herself as very capable.

VIVIAN RICH

Many are the scenes that too thoughtful spectators have ruined by their willingness to rush to the aid of an afflicted actress. Mary Fuller is the latest victim, and her experience was distressing, to say the least. She and Richard Tucker were sent out from Larchmont in a large motor boat which was to catch fire. A stage hand concealed in the cabin lit his smoke pot, and Tucker, seizing the only life preserver, strapped it on and plunged overboard, leaving Miss Fuller, enveloped in dense smoke, imploring him to save her. Then, in desperation, Miss Fuller leaped overboard. So far all had gone well, but now Walter Edwin saw all his plans go to smash as a boat put out from one of the big yachts and, despite his frantic efforts to stop it, proceeded right into the picture and the protesting actress was hauled aboard. It was impossible to start the scene over again with the principals dripping wet, and so three hours were lost while an automobile raced back to the Edison Studio for a fresh supply of "natty summer clothes."

MISSION BELLS (July 31).—Wealthy Jack Worthington, an atheist, purchases a home in the beautiful mission town. He gets acquainted with Barbara Gordon, a devout church girl, and it is not long until the interest aroused by the first meeting develops into love. All seems to be going smoothly and Jack proposes. A vital question with Barbara is the religious attitude of her husband-to-be, and she puts the question boldly. The couple are seated in a hammock, and her question is acted out in a beautiful vision. The answer is seen in the frivolous look that spreads over the countenance of the atheist. Of course there is no engagement.

Jack, on a hunting expedition, meets with a mishap, is found by a monk, who has him taken to a nearby monastery, where he is given every attention. While there the atheist is converted and later renews his attentions to Barbara, who finally accepts his attentions upon the monk's assurance of her lover's sincerity.

SINGLE-HANDED JIM (Aug. 2).—How many fool stunts have been carried out as the result of a wager!

Jim makes a bet that he can stop the stage coach on two successive days, and this in spite of the fact that the sheriff boasts of his authentic record that no gunman has escaped him in his time of service.

A little love element enters the story when the sheriff's daughter shows favor to Jim and disregards the deputy sheriff, an ardent admirer.

Jim accomplishes his feat in a masterful manner. The deputy sheriff emulates the example in such a manner as to reflect on Jim, but his desire foils his plot and he comes under the strong arm of the law.

KINEMACOLOR

HIAWATHA.—From one of the most wonderful poems in the English language, this film is taken. For the first time in the history of moving picture taking, we see snow as it really looks. Wonderful are these pictures, the trees white with snow, deep greens peeping from among snowladen branches, the brilliant colors of the Indian costumes, making a color scheme possible only by the power of Kinemacolor.

The story is of the famine, and fever lurks among the tents deep in snow. Into Hiawatha's tent come these dread visitors, seizing Minnehaha. By a wonderful double exposure fever and famine are seen by the side of Minnehaha. Out into the forest rushes Hiawatha, gathering here and there a twig for firewood. Dying Minnehaha calls for her beloved, and in the desolate forest Hiawatha hears this call and hurries homeward. Watched over by her husband and his old grandmother, Nokomis, Minnehaha dies.

Truly wonderful and thrilling is her burial. Covered by a robe of ermine, in his arms Hiawatha carries his beloved, followed by all the wailing Indians. They push their way through the snow to an Indian bier of tree branches. On this is laid Minnehaha. Funeral services are held and the grave is filled with snow. The Indians leave, and Hiawatha is shown alone, a huge fire sending crimson flames against the sky to light Minnehaha to the "Land of the Hereafter."

WHEN LOVE GROWS UP.—Two kings desire that their children marry, thereby combining the kingdoms. One is a prince, a little too young to consider marriage seriously, while the other is a sweet girl, who is not disposed to give up her toys and dolls just yet. The King of Joyland dispatches his son, the Prince, with a letter:

To the King of Youthland:

We desire the hand of the Princess Carita for our heir, Prince Donatella. We will consider this marriage as a treaty of peace between our kingdoms.

Alvarido, King of Joyland.

In the meantime the King of Youthland has ordered that the Princess shall marry, and to the Queen's plea—"Let her stay a child a little longer," the King answers—"She shall be wed within the year." Consequently the arrival of the young Prince at Youthland is agreeable to the King, and he at once dispatches the Queen and the ladies in waiting to bring the Princess before him.

The Princess is playing with her dolls, attended by the nurse, when the Queen enters. Sending the nurse away she gently takes the doll from the child and exclaims, "Playtime is over, darling," so they proceed to dress her in court costume. She is then hurried into the throne room and presented to the Prince, her husband-to-be. Timidly she recoils and at last rushes into her mother's arms. The Prince, in pity, exclaims, "I cannot wed a frightened child. I will stay and be her playmate until her heart grows up." The Queen pleads, so the King consents; consequently they at once become playmates indulging in games such as "Blindman's Buff," etc. The Prince even goes so far as to join in her play with her dolls and toys, and throughout the following month the two are inseparable; but as the month has passed the Prince despairs, for he has learned to love her devotedly, and exclaims, "Will nothing awake her."

ZEB, ZACK AND THE ZULUS (July 24).—Zebediah Jackson and Zachariah Johnson, two colored missionaries who have been sent out by the African Mission Society, arrive at the African port and start for the interior. They sit down to rest when some Zulus happen to see them. The Zulus chase Zeb and Zack, capture them and drag them by the feet to the king. The king decides to eat them, but as one is not quite fat enough they are to be held for a few days. The king appropriates the coats and hats of the two and is quite taken with a pair of specs belonging to one of the unfortunates. While he is trying to decipher what they are the missionaries make a bolt for liberty. They are, however, recaptured and put in the cage and guarded by several Zulus. Having some tobacco and wanting to soothe their nerves they decide to take a chew. While they are doing so the guards see them and, thinking that the tobacco is something good to eat, they take it away from Zeb and Zack and eat it. Naturally they get terribly sick. A Zulu happens to pass the prison cage and, seeing the condition of the guards, rushes to the king's hut and bursts in while he is closeted with the counselors. After the Zulu tells his story the counselors decide that the two men are evil spirits and should be gotten rid of. The medicine man is informed and all the tribe is assembled at the incantation. After this ceremony is over they march off to get the missionaries. When they arrive at the cage they are astonished to find that Zeb and Zack have charmed the guards who were placed on duty to replace the sick ones and have persuaded them to let them out of the cage. This was accomplished by singing the popular song, "Everybody's Doing It," and dancing the trot. When the king and tribesmen arrive on the scene they are at first inclined to be angry but the harmonious voices of the missionaries, accompanied with the peculiar movement of the body performed by Zeb and Zack, has the same effect on all, and the two captives lead the Zulus on a joyful dance through the village. While the Zulus are all engaged in the song and dance Zeb and Zack make their escape to the beach, where a yawl from a ship lying out at sea has put in for water. They tell the sailors of their plight and the good-hearted seamen take them in the boat and all hurriedly pull out, glad to escape with their lives.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE SCHOOLMA'AM'S SWEETHEART (July 26).—Marjorie Wayne, the new school teacher, comes to town and boards at the same ranch where Broncho Billy is foreman. Broncho Billy falls in love with her winsome ways and proposes to her. She tells him she does not love him but expresses a wish that they be good friends. Her sweetheart from the city comes to the ranch and she marries him, much to the chagrin of Broncho Billy. Not long after the wedding Steve gets into bad company and is persuaded to join in stealing some horses. He is captured by a posse, who are about to make short work of him, when Broncho Billy, through his love for Bessie, holds up the posse and allows him to escape.

PAT'S FANCY DRESS (July 25).—When Pat accepts an invitation to take part in a fancy dress ball at Countess Hikiks, it never enters into his wildest dreams that he is to be let in for the most weird experience that has ever fallen to the lot of mortal man. Pat visits a costumer and, wishing to be something quite out of the common, obtains a dress fashioned out of a leopard's skin with a leopard's head as a mask. When he appears in this the ladies have several fits, each stronger than its predecessor. Pat thinks this high old fun, and so it is, till a real leopard appears on the scene. At first the animal is a bit taken back, and thinks his last drink must have been something stronger than water. Then he pulls himself together and starts a close inspection. Pat seeks safety in flight, and only gets it after having covered several miles with the leopard clinging on to the most tender parts of his anatomy. He approaches a river and dives beneath its inviting waters, then he strikes for home. But his troubles are not over, because he has the most violent of nightmares, awakening to find himself doing valiant battle with a hearth rug made from a leopard's skin.

On the same reel:

YOU NEVER CAN TELL.—Mrs. Woodland has two weaknesses: one for a handsome young man by the name of Jack Hunthard, and the other for stray cats. Hubby does not share in these infatuations. His remarks concerning pauper cats tend to be of an incandescent nature, and as regards Jack, well, it is a case of "where ignorance is bliss." Hubby arranges to go shooting, and starts out with his better half's blessing, for that somewhat flighty young lady has invited Jack and is looking forward to a good time. On the field of action the opposing forces being an aged rabbit who is on his way to the post-office to draw his old-age pension, and a blind sparrow, our noble sportsman does not distinguish himself and, meeting a boy who is carrying a re-

SOLAX

AS YOU SOW (July 25).—Jeanette, the pretty daughter of hard-working people of the tenement district, envies other girls with good clothing. She loaths the dinginess of her own neighborhood. Jeanette has made the acquaintance of a girl in the neighborhood named Carrie—considered rather fast. Carrie happens in one evening and invites Jeanette out with her for "a good time." Jennie remembers her lack of pretty dresses, but Carrie overcomes the objection by offering to fit her out. The parents demur, but finally consent, with the admonition, "We will wait up, so do not be late."

Arrived at Carrie's room, which is very elaborately furnished, Jeanette is surprised at the display of finery and remarks, "I don't see how you manage it on $6 per week." Fully arrayed, they set forth and meet a couple of young men with whom Carrie is acquainted, and they go to a restaurant and are cajoled and laughed at, and Jeanette drinks her first glass. A once beautiful woman enters bedecked with silks and jewels, and she is the cynosure of all eyes, especially Jeanette's. The woman orders a drink, and falls to gazing at the crowd; her eyes finally rest on Jeanette, and she understands. A conflict of emotions seems raging in her breast as she watches and listens, and when the escort of Jeanette speaks in aside to the waiter and asks Jeanette to follow, she gets up also and arrives at the door in time to see the fellow almost forcing the girl into a cab. She knocks him down and takes Jeanette under her protection. Arrived at her room, she shows Jeanette what a terrible fate she has avoided by telling her a story of her own life. Jeanette realizes and wants to go home to mother—who sits there patiently and anxiously awaiting the daughter's return. But Jeanette, ashamed and afraid of the wrath of her father, hesitates. The woman writes a note, and gets Jeanette's promise to deliver it to her parents, then calls a cab and bids her farewell.

Jeanette arrives home to her anxious parents and, unable to explain, hands them the note:

"Dear Friends: Do not chide your daughter. But one out of every thousand returns unsullied from where she has been to-night. She has seen, she has heard. she has had her lesson. I, one of the vilest, was once pure as she, but I took the fatal step, and no voice spoke the one word that meant my salvation—Mother."

VITAGRAPH

DR. CRATHERN'S EXPERIMENT (July 28).—Dr. Crathern, a wealthy physician, but deformed from birth, spends all his time going about the homes of poor people and giving them all the help at his command. While making his rounds one day he hears a cry from a poor tenement and enters. He sees Mrs. Marley cruelly beating her blind niece, Hope, for a trifling fault, and intervenes in her behalf. The doctor is much impressed by the girl's beauty and determines to remove her to better surroundings.

The Marleys readily agree when Crathern proposes to adopt the girl and accept a sum of money from him when the papers are drawn out making him her legal guardian. Hope is taken to the doctor's house, where she is tenderly cared for by Mrs. Brown, Crathern's housekeeper. After a while she is sent away to a school for the blind, returning two years later grown to be a beautiful young woman.

Thinking that she will never see his hideous deformity, Dr. Crathern resolves that, if she loves him well enough, he will marry her. Hope joyfully accepts him and the date of the wedding is fixed and all arrangements made for the ceremony.

Dr. Crathern is visited by Dr. Arthur Spencer, the celebrated eyesight specialist, who sees Hope and examines her eyes. He tells Crathern that there is a possibility of an operation restoring her sight. If this be so, thinks her guardian, it would not be right for him to marry her as her love may turn to loathing when she sees what manner of man he really is. Accordingly, the wedding is postponed and the operation performed. It is successful and, when finally the bandage is removed from Hope's eyes, she is able to see.

When she inquires for Dr. Crathern she learns that he has gone away, fearing to let her see his ugliness. She at once has a telegram sent to him telling him that unless he returns to her side she will wish that she was still blind. Crathern returns. Instead of turning from him with disgust, as he fears she will, Hope holds out her arms to him and tells him that she could never be happy with any other man and that he is her ideal. Crathern is happy in the knowledge that he has done the right thing by the girl and that he cannot reproach himself with having in any way taken advantage of her.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 21).

IN AND AROUND SCUTARI AFTER ITS CAPTURE (July 22).—A remarkable picture in and about the fortified city of Scutari, captured after a long seige by the Montenegrins in the late Balkan war. The hills of Tarabosch and Badnagall are shown, dotted here and there with abandoned cannon in positions eloquent of the haste with which the Turks evacuated their posts. The dead lying in ghastly groups on the ground tell us of the terrible struggle. Within the city it is evident that the shells have done terrible damage, and the starving children in the streets bespeak of the horrors of the long siege. No words can make such an eloquent plea for universal peace as this picture.

On the same reel:

IN WEIRD CRIMEA.—An interesting view of this ancient country shows, among other things, a view of the abandoned city which was inhabited by the Skiffs about 2,000 years ago. Monasteries cut from solid rock perched on seemingly inaccessible points on the cliff and scenery wild, rugged and interesting, is shown in the picture.

A FALSE ACCUSATION (July 23).—In this thrilling picture in a mining camp in the West a dramatic story is woven around a young miner and his desire for revenge and a little Indian boy whose parental instinct is stirred by the sight of a "paleface" child's doll. In his anxiety to have a doll for his own little redskin appropriates a baby, and the crime of kidnapping is fastened on a discharged miner. Just how the latter is captured and acquitted and what happened to the baby and the Indian boy make a mighty interesting picture with many unusual features.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 24).

OPPORTUNITY AND A MILLION ACRES (July 24).—This picture is fascinating in its exposition of the vast possibilities of an enormous tract of land in Harney County, Oregon. The Central Oregon Railroad, constructed by J. J. Hill, the empire builder, to tap the fertile valleys of Oregon, has its terminus 150 miles away from this beautiful valley shown in the film. Homesteaders trailing in with old-fashioned prairie schooners and taking up their homesteads are shown, as are many views of the great waterway of Harney County, the irrigation canal which took fifteen years to build and will make it possible for 20,000 families to live and get rich.

On the same reel:

THE ISLAND OF TONGA.—This little gem in the Pacific Ocean is the only independent monarchy left in the South Sea islands. This picture gives us many interesting views of the life here in all its simplicity. The natives are very hospitable; they were warlike at one time, but now follow peaceful pursuits. The old dances, the manners and customs of the people, the way they live and the many interesting sidelights are all shown.

VIPERS AT HOME (July 25).—This is an excellent picture of a species of snake, the proper name for which is Viviparous, which means that they give birth to living young rather than hatching their young from eggs as do other snakes. The vipers are always poisonous and usually have flat, triangular heads, thick bodies and stumpy tails. The effects of a viper bite vary in adults, producing nausea, unconsciousness and sometimes death. The catching of these snakes, the treating of the wounds and the snake's habits are clearly shown with clear, interesting subtitles.

On the same reel:

A TRIP TO THE GROTTOS OF BAUME (Scenic).—This picturesque portion of France is beautifully shown in this colored Patheplay. The marvelously interesting grottos attract the tourists from all over France and their far-famed beauties are shown with fidelity and naturalness peculiar to Pathe productions.

THE MAD SCULPTOR (July 26).—Mrs. Paul Wilbur, the wife of a famous sculptor, meets with a shocking accident. Grief unbalances Paul's mind and his cousin, Howard Ingraham, for a monetary consideration, takes advantage of the sculptor's sad state. Mrs. Wilbur recovers but is mourning her husband for dead when chance leads her to the spot where he is kept prisoner and fate then deals a deathblow to the plotting Howard Ingraham.

NESTOR

THE PROOF (July 28).—John Norton, a young miner, finds life in the West is big and broad and so filled with work that he has little time for loneliness; but one evening as he is enjoying his after-dinner cigar and watching the purple shadows under the giant fire blur to black smudges as night drew her brush across the picture, he awakens to the fact that for some time he has been growing lonely. With this knowledge comes the determination to remedy this state of affairs and a month later he returns to his mountain home, bringing with him a young and lovely bride.

Edith, the new bride, finds life in the mountains full of delightful days and is completely happy. She superintends the work of the faithful Chinaman who has always cared for John and completely wins him over by her tender care of her husband. John, however, soon finds matters at the mine not working as smoothly as he wishes, and soon the mine takes up more of his time than during the first months following his marriage, and consequently he fails to show Edith the many little attentions that so pleased her.

It is the old, old story of a heart hungry for attention and the ever-present temptation. In this case the temptation takes a very pleasing form. Dick Bainbridge, a friend of Norton's, comes for a visit. He is soon attracted to Edith's fresh, young face, and when he finds that Norton is neglecting his wife, Dick's ardor is kindled anew.

Dick and Edith have many pleasant rides and excursions, and on one of them Dick attempts to make love to his friend's wife. Edith, knowing Dick's youth, firmly but kindly repulses his advances and tells him that she loves her husband. Norton, who has returned for a paper, sees the episode from a distance and mistakes Edith's earnest conversation. He will not listen to an explanation, but orders Dick from his house. Dick attempts to tell Norton that Edith has been faithful in every respect, but Norton, crazed with jealousy, will not heed him. Dick, realizing that Norton is desperate, rushes for the one gun, which is on a shelf in the cabin. Dick gets the gun and, pointing it at Norton, makes him listen while he tells Norton that Edith repulsed him. Norton still will not believe Dick, and the latter plans a test. He fires the gun in the air, and Edith's great joy when she finds her husband is unharmed convinces Norton that he still has his wife's love.

Edith, realizing that her husband has doubted her and think he no longer loves her, prepared to take her departure, but Norton sees her from the window and, reaching out as she passes, draws her close to the window and through the open sash draws her into his sheltering embrace.

WHAT PAPA GOT (Aug. 3).—Pearl, and Chester, her sweetheart, rehearse amateur theatricals so as to have an excuse for their lovemaking. As a result they incur the displeasure of Pearl's pa and he forbids Chester calling at the house. This Chester refuses to agree to, and pa is compelled to kick him out on his next visit. The next day Chester writes Pearl a note asking her to meet him that afternoon in the park near her home. Pa gets hold of the note and devises a scheme to once for all get rid of the unwelcome suitor. He makes sure that Pearl intends keeping the appointment and then he hires a tough to beat Chester up as he waits in the park for Pearl. The tough that pa hired gets hurt in an accident and he induces his friend, another ruffian, to take his place and to give the waiting victim a very severe trouncing. Pearl is about half an hour late in keeping the appointment and Chester sees Pearl's pa waiting, also, a little distance away. Chester sees that pa is onto the game, so he strolls away just as the tough comes into view. Pa determines to wait until Pearl shows up and thinks that he will be able to cure her of her infatuation. The tough mistakes pa for the man he is supposed to beat up, and sets sail for him. He literally cuts the old man to pieces, when Chester happens to turn and see it. He rescues pa and takes him home. Pearl is just about leaving, but pa, thankful, for his rescue, joins the young couple's hands and insists that Chester is a real hero and worthy of Pearl's hand.

On the same reel:

HER LITTLE DARLING.—Balsam, a gay widower, courts the widow Snow. She promises to marry him, provided he will always love her and her little darling, at present at school. They are married, Balsam never suspecting that little darling was a cherub weighing two hundred pounds. Later, after the child, so called, insisted on calling Balsam papa and sitting on his lap, she is sent back to boarding school. Her mother dies and Balsam, after the period of mourning is over, decides to take unto himself another wife. He courts the pretty Myrtle Minx, and his suit is successful. They are married, Balsam, of course, neglecting to mention Little Darling. Unexpectedly, she pays her father a visit, just as Myrtle's father is visiting them. Balsam is in a quandary. He hides the cherub in another room and she falls asleep. Myrtle insists that she hears a noise in the other room, it being the snoring of the big girl, but Balsam lies out of it. The deception is continued for a while until Myrtle's pet dog jumps on the cherub's shoulder causing her to awaken and to let out a horrifying scream. She, of course, is discovered and Myrtle insists that the woman is not Balsam's aunt, as he lyingly contends. She rushes from the room, and Balsam follows her. Myrtle's father stays with Little Darling and they fall in love. They go away and get married. Returning, they inform the still fighting couple of what has happened and when Little Darling informs Myrtle that she is her stepmother as well as her stepdaughter, all are in a state of collapse.

IN AFTER YEARS (Aug. 1).—In a double-exposure scene Gertrude is dying, at the age of about forty, and is playing her own daughter, at the age of about eighteen. She sends a letter to Jim, her old sweetheart who is about forty, asking him to care for her daughter.

When Jim gets the letter he sees a vision of his past affair with Gertrude. As boy and girl in the country they are in love. A city chap comes, and Gertrude is attracted to him. He is a drunkard. They arrange an elopement. Gertrude does not know of this. Gertrude passes Jim's house at night, and he sees her. The city chap follows. Jim follows the city chap, arrives at the place where he and Gertrude are, and protests. The city chap strikes Jim over the head, with the butt of a revolver, and he and Gertrude elope, on horseback, or in a horse and wagon.

With the passing of years Jim grows prosperous. This ends the vision scene.

When Gertrude comes to Jim, he is struck by her resemblance to her mother. He falls in love with her. Another city chap comes. He also is a drunkard. Jim forbids Gertrude from having anything to do with him, fearing she may share her mother's fate. Gertrude flirts with the chap, and Jim is angry. The chap takes Jim's automobile, and goes to a spot nearby, leaving a note for Gertrude. She follows, leaving the note where Jim finds it. The chap tries to force Gertrude to elope, but Jim comes on the scene and prevents it. He takes Gertrude home in the auto.

Arriving home, Jim is in despair over Gertrude's conduct. She pouts, and pretends to be penitent. At the saddest moment in the scene Gertrude says to Jim, "I only went with him to make you jealous. You are so stupid I have to propose to you myself." Jim realizes that happiness has come to him at last.

THE STRANGER (July 28).—John Howard and Jack Noble are business partners. Jack is the junior partner of the firm and he is in love with Grace, Howard's daughter.

The firm is in financial difficulties and to overcome this Grace is to marry Elbert Havens, a millionaire. Grace loves Jack—Havens loves Grace—Jack insists upon Grace marrying him, but she feels that she is duty bound to help her father and determines to marry Havens though she does not love him.

At a reception given in honor of her engagement to Havens, the engagement is announced and the couple are recipients of hearty congratulations. Jack sees this and as Havens and the men leave to get refreshments he takes Grace into the conservatory, where he implores her to elope with him; she refuses, but Jack takes her in his arms. At this moment Havens has returned to the reception room looking for Grace.

He starts into the conservatory but is halted by the sight of her in Jack's arms. Wild with rage and humiliation he rushes from the house and walks the streets aimlessly. He comes to a moving picture show and not knowing what he is doing, follows the crewd in.

The guests at the reception are enjoying themselves, and Havens, for the moment, is not missed. Howard finally misses him and goes in search of him.

At the picture house the song, "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine," is sung. This decides him—that is where he will go—away from sham and duplicity. He hurries home, has his servant pack his clothes, he writes a note to Grace telling her that he has gone forever, giving his reason: the stain from the violets on her admirer's shirt front, which was left there from the embrace. He then leaves the house, telling his servant he has gone for good and that there will be no need of anyone looking for him.

Grace receives the note after her guests have gone. Her father reads it, then upbraids her. He goes to Havens' house—the servant can give him no information as to Havens' whereabouts. Fearing that Havens contemplates suicide Howard rushes to the police station and sends out a general alarm. A reporter, scenting a scoop, rushes to his paper and the next morning the papers are full of news regarding the mysterious disappearance of the millionaire.

The next day finds Havens taking a train from a suburban station for the mountains of Tennessee. He arrives at Stumpville. An old lady gets off there. She smiles and bows to Havens and recognizes him as the millionaire from the picture in the paper she has carried from the North. Havens finds his hotel, while the old lady is welcomed home by her husband, son and daughter, Jen, who is the typical mountain flower. The next morning Havens starts out with his gun and comes across Jen on a bridge. She snubs him and runs away. Havens having made an impression upon the girl she returns; the impression being mutual, Havens also comes back; the girl again snubs him and runs away, leaving Havens on the bridge watching her.

The next day Havens starts out on a fishing excursion and is attracted to the bridge where he again finds the girl. He is very polite. His actions are noticed by Lem, the girl's mountain lover, who, after Havens has gone, comes to the girl and sarcastically imitates the city man. He seizes her. This angers the girl; she bites his hand to force him to let go, and runs away. Havens, from a distance, has seen this, and he rejoins the girl. Lem, thoroughly enraged, determines to get even, so he informs Jen's father and brother, who are moonshiners, that Havens is a revenue officer. Havens and Jen having become better acquainted, leave for Jen's home, where Havens meets Jen's mother, who immediately recognizes him. She shows Jen the paper with the picture in it, and after Havens has gone she tears the picture part out of it and hides it in her bosom.

That night the mountaineers congregate in front of Jen's home. She overhears them plotting to do harm to Havens and immediately rushes to his assistance. The mountaineers congregate at the hotel and Havens is hemmed in, but manages to escape. Then ensues a chase through the mountains, where Havens is finally overtaken. As they are about to do him bodily harm, Jen appears, proves who he is, and the mob melts away, crestfallen. Havens gives the girl to her mother, telling her to take good care of her for him until to-morrow.

FATE AND THREE (Aug. 1).—After a storm at sea, Henry is washed ashore and rescued by Mary, her brother John, and her mother. They take him to their shack by the sea and attend him.

Henry recovers and becomes a member of the simple family, helping in their fishing expeditions. He falls in love with Mary, who returns his love. They become engaged. Alma, a woman of the village, also falls in love with Henry, but he refuses to have anything to do with her.

John goes to town to get supplies. Mary and Henry are seated on the rocks and are seen by Alma, who comes on just as Mary leaves and returns to the house. Seeing that Mary is watching them, Alma throws herself into Henry's arms and remains long enough to be seen by Mary. She then goes on to the house, changing her ring from one hand to another, and tells Mary that she and Henry are engaged.

Mary believes Alma and accuses Henry of unfaithfulness. Mary's mother, who has witnessed the scene between Alma and Henry and heard the argument between Mary and Alma, is overcome with excitement and dies of heart failure. Mary becomes crazed with grief and accuses Henry of causing her mother's death.

While Mary is in the house brooding over her trouble, Alma enters. She notices Mary's condition. Alma moves a knife until it touches Mary's hand. Mary feels the handle, grasps the knife and determines to kill Henry, as Alma had planned. She leaves the house, followed by Alma.

Mary comes upon Henry lying beside an overturned boat which he is repairing. Mary crawls over the boat from the opposite side and is about to stab Henry when John, returning from his trip, comes upon the scene, rushes to the end of the boat, lifting it and throwing Mary to the ground, thus saving Henry.

Explanations ensue and Mary is brought to a realization of what she has attempted. Alma is driven from the village by the neighbors, and Mary and Henry are reunited.

THE POWER OF HEREDITY (July 31).—A young mother, the wife of a dissolute husband, a sailor, is deserted and goes back to service. The Delmars live in the country and, finding it difficult to keep servants, are glad to employ the young girl when she, with her baby, apply to them for a situation.

The young mother sickens and dies. A letter found among her effects shows the Delmars it is useless to expect aid from her husband. They decide to adopt the infant and keep her lowly birth a secret.

Eighteen years later we see the girl arrive from school. She promptly falls in love with the butler, thus proving the power of heredity. The butler proves to be a man of resources. He saves the young girl's life in a heroic manner and she, confiding in her diary, declares, "I must have a yellow streak—I'm in love with the butler."

Later—the old sailor returns. The sight of home scenes awakens his heart and he claims his child, Marie. After seeing her real father, she seeks the butler and introduces them and naively asks the butler, "After seeing him are you afraid to ask me?"

Class distinction may prove anything but commendable at times, but in this picture we aptly see that like begets like, and while environment may change us externally, the unwritten law of heredity invariably asserts itself.

"101 BISON"

ROBINSON CRUSOE (July 29).—Robinson Crusoe cannot overcome his great desire to cross the seas in search of adventure, and his parents are much distressed. One day he goes to them and begs to be allowed to ship aboard some vessel, but both his father and mother lecture him and appeal to him and he gives his promise to give up the idea.

His desires prove too great for him to keep this promise, and one day he runs away to sea. He has qualms of conscience as he gazes upon the receding shore, and suffers other qualms of a physical nature very soon afterwards. The good ship arrives in the South Seas. A terrible storm arises and the vessel is soon a total wreck and Robinson is the sole survivor. He reaches shore more dead than alive and offers up thanks to God for his deliverance. That night, in mortal fear of wild beasts, Crusoe sleeps in a tree. The following morning Robinson sets to work to provision himself and swims to the wreck. He makes many trips and secures supplies and provisions, but what pleases him even more is in securing a cat and a dog.

Later, Robinson builds him a well stocked and barricaded home and finds solace in hard work. The years pass and Robinson adds to his friends in the form of goats, parrots and other animals, and he repairs daily to his lookout platform in the hopes of seeing a friendly sail.

One day, whilst making the rounds of his island, he comes across footprints, which strikes terror to his soul, and later he sees, through his telescope, the arrival of some canoes containing cannibals. He hurries to the shore and is in time to kill several cannibals, who are pursuing one man who has escaped and who has been destined for a meal. The cannibals, terrified at the noise and at seeing their companions fall without being struck, hurry way in their canoes and Robinson makes friends with his man, Friday.

For two years Friday is Robinson's constant friend and learns to talk his language. Again the cannibals visit the island, and this time Robinson and Friday are enabled to rescue a Spanish castaway sailor and an old Indian, who proves to be Friday's father. Together they make a happy family, and Robinson almost forgets his long days of loneliness.

Their peace of mind is broken by the arrival of a boat from the ship of Captain Hardy, who is rowed ashore, together with his beautiful daughter, and bound and left on the rocks. Those members of the mutinous crew who have accompanied Captain Hardy and his daughter are attacked by Robinson Crusoe and his trusty three. That night, whilst the mate and his companions are throwing dice in the cabin, they are suddenly attacked by Robinson Crusoe and his companions and after a terrific battle, both in the cabin and later on deck, the crew are defeated. Many of them are only too glad to get away from their murderous companions and enlist under Robinson Crusoe's command. The others are placed upon the island and left there.

Robinson Crusoe and his companions embark on the ship. They are attacked by cannibals, who are repulsed, but in the fight poor Friday is killed by an arrow and is buried at sea, mourned by his father and Robinson Crusoe.

On the long voyage back to Crusoe's motherland his acquaintance with the Captain's daughter ripens into love. He returns to his native town, where he is received with great rejoicing and married to the Captain's daughter.

Robinson Crusoe and his wife live to a ripe old age, and he never tires of the circle of children who surround him, clamoring for a recital of his stirring adventures.

MAJESTIC

THE MIGHTY HUNTER (July 22).—Barnes has the reputation of being a daring and mighty hunter. His home is filled with souvenirs of his prowess with the gun.

At a dinner to some of his club friends he tells them of some of his adventures, his hairbreadth escapes, hunting tigers and lions in the African jungle, elephants in India. In proof of the veracity of his tales he conducts them to another room and shows them his collection of guns and trophies, tusks and skins. He has one regret: he has never shot a bear. One of his guests, Tom, who has a ranch in Arkansas, invites him out there where he can shoot bear to his heart's content—the woods are full of 'em. Barnes shakes hands and accepts.

On the day of Barnes' arrival Tom goes into the corral to catch one of his horses. He has a halter concealed behind him and takes from his pockets some sugar to coax the horse. He hitches up and drives to town. He looks at his watch and stops on the street to see an Italian organ grinder performing tricks with a trained bear. The Italian, after each trick, gives the bear a lump of sugar. Suddenly the bear becomes unruly and escapes. The Italian takes after him but loses him in the nearby woods.

Tom meets Barnes at the depot and drives home with him. He shows him his collection of skins—bears of all varieties, nearly. Then he gives him a gun and an old hunting coat that he had himself worn that morning when catching the horse. Barnes starts out. Once out of sight of the house his fears assert themselves. He starts at every noise and becomes more and more frightened, until, when a real bear appears, he fires in the air and takes to his heels. The bear chases him. Tom sees Barnes coming, takes in the situation, and laughs heartily. Barnes, to conceal his embarrassment, shouts: "Tom, Tom; I'm bringing him home alive!"

It turns out that it is only the Italian's bear, and all the poor animal wants is the sugar concealed in the pockets of Tom's coat, which Barnes is wearing. Barnes is very much mortified.

"You're a peach of a hunter," says Tom.

"For heaven's sake, don't tell the boys at the club," pleads Barnes. "I never hunted anything but rabbits and chipmunks in my life!"

THANHOUSER

THE TOP OF NEW YORK (July 25).—A dapper sergeant in the army won the love of a pretty young stenographer, and they had planned that as soon as his term of enlistment was up he would enter private life and marry her. The girl was employed by a firm who had offices in one of the tallest of New York's skyscrapers, and her sweetheart saw her there. She took him to her favorite observatory, the roof of the building, where he obtained a magnificent and uninterrupted view of the greatest city in the world. He, on his part, took his sweetheart to the army maneuvers, where she witnessed with delight the well drilled troops, but would not confess that there was one man among them who could compare with the one of her choice. She was particularly interested in the signal corps, however, and at odd times the sergeant instructed her in the code until she had become fairly proficient in it.

One Saturday afternoon the girl repaired to her "observatory" and gazed longingly toward Governor's Island, for it was there that her fiance was stationed. In some way the door to the roof became closed behind her and as it was a spring lock she found herself a prisoner. Beating on the door failed to bring her any help. The crowds in the street, many, many, feet below, could not see or hear her, and she finally realized with growing terror that relief would probably not come before Monday morning. Exposed to the elements all that night, she was on the verge of a breakdown the following morning and knew that she could never stand another twenty-four hours of privation. Suddenly she thought of the signal code which she had laughingly learned from her soldier sweetheart. With her veil and a piece of wood she found on the roof she improvised a rude flag and, facing Governor's Island, repeated over and over again the one word "Help."

Fortunately for her the sergeant had a visitor that day, a sea captain, and he pointed out to him the magnificent building where the girl of his heart was employed. The captain took a closer glance through his field glasses, caught the signal, and the man she loved was able to save the girl who, when he found her, was unconscious and rapidly nearing death.

RELIANCE

MARIA ROMA (July 23).—Maria Roma, a beautiful Italian opera singer, while performing in the Grand Opera House at Naples, attracts the attention of Lawrence Malet, an American millionaire. He is introduced to her and a mutual attraction is the result.

Maria and Lawrence become good friends, to the great jealousy of Capucci, Maria's manager. Seeing her enter the theatre on Lawrence's arm, Capucci protests his love. She laughs at him, for to her he has seemed but a kind friend. He forces his attentions on her until she, frightened and unnerved, refuses to go on that night. Lawrence, in his box, hears the announcement that, owing to a sudden indisposition of the great soprano, there will be no performance that evening. Worried, he hurries around to Maria's dressing room, where she tells him the trouble. He wants to go after Capucci, but she refuses to allow this. Putting her cloak about her, he insists that she leave the theatre with him and be married at once. She consents. After the wedding, Maria and her American husband live happily in Naples until one day she receives a letter from Capucci stating that he will never die until he has found a way to be revenged on her and her husband. To avert this vengeance from her husband, Maria decides to leave him at once. During Lawrence's absence, his wife steals away and embarks on a steamer bound for America. Here, under an assumed name, she sings in the cheap Italian theatre. Lawrence, finding Capucci's note, realizes why Maria left him. His detectives trace her to America and, in hope of finding his beloved wife there, Lawrence returns to his own country. Capucci also goes to America and discovers Maria in the cast of an East Side Carmen company. Seeing a chance for revenge, he goes to the tenor of this organization, who is an old friend of his, and prevails upon him to let him sing his role that night. Lawrence, wandering about the Italian quarters, also happens into this theatre. Maria recognizes Capucci when he comes out on the stage, and seeing the dagger in his hand, she realizes that he intends to turn the stage tragedy into a real tragedy. As he advances toward her, knife in hand, she shrinks away. Lawrence, in a stage box, recognizes Maria and starts forward. Then he sees Capucci and, realizing his wife's danger, he jumps over the box rail just in time to grab the Italian's dagger. Maria falls into her husband's arms, and Capucci, in the grasp of two policemen hastily summoned, snatches a knife from the belt of one of the actors and kills himself. Lawrence leads Maria away to his home, where a happy future awaits them both.

THE HIGHER JUSTICE (2 Reels) (July 26).—Brice, a rich young college fellow, sees a pretty country girl driving with her mother through the college street. He bets that he will make her acquaintance. He does so by pretending his motor car needs water and stopping at her father's door. He seizes the first chance to make desperate love to her, and her father, seeing this, orders him off the farm. She believes in Brice, however, and, meeting him again, accepts his offer to go motoring. One of his friends, as a joke, turns his collar about, pretending to be a minister. This gives Brice an idea, and the girl is tricked into a mock marriage. Brice disappears from college, the girl from her home. Detectives trace the young man, through his checks, to a country hotel. His father goes to him and, finding him with the girl, gives him a choice between leaving her or being disowned. Then Brice tells her the truth and she, stunned and heart-broken, sees him depart with his father. Now is shown the world's attitude toward the man and the woman. The man meets the joke and the glad hand, the girl the raised sword of society. Hearing that he is about to marry another, she goes to him and tells him she is going to be a mother. She begs him to give his son a name. He refuses while in another room the guests are at his bachelor dinner singing "For he's a jolly good fellow, which nobody can deny." A son is born to the girl, in poverty and disgrace. Later, a child is born to Brice's wife, who raises her son in luxury. Years pass. The poor girl's son rises step by step in the little office of a country lawyer and is at last admitted to the bar. Brice's legitimate son is sent to college and there follows in the footsteps of his father. Petted, spoiled and pampered, this son of wealth has never had a real chance. While his hardworking brother meets and falls in love with a simple country girl, he falls into the clutches of a female crook who takes all she can from him and is about to leave town with her pal. Young Brice follows them in his car, raises a quarrel with the man, whom, in a sudden outburst of anger, he murders. The woman prevents his escape. He is taken to town and his brother, who, of course, does not know him, is designated as commonwealth attorney to try his case. He does try the case, smashing the defense all to atoms and breaking his brother to pieces on cross-examination. During the recess of the court, his mother brings his lunch, and there she finds the man who has ruined her trying to bribe her son. The sight drives her mad and she denounces him. Allen finds it is his brother he is sending to the chair. But in his rage against the man who has ruined his mother he goes on with the case. The pitiful sight of his brother moves him, and he turns the trial on the father as the real criminal who has bred his son in vice and drunkenness and is the main instigator of the crime. The son, during the excitement of the denunciation, springs up. His father tries to drag him back. The boy strikes him and falls dead.

Later, alone in the cell, bending over the dead body of his son, Brice realizes the power of the higher justice which has spoken at last.

AMERICAN KINETO

THE LOVE ROMANCE OF SIR FRANCIS DRAKE (Two Reel Feature).—In natural Old World settings of surpassing beauty and romantic local color we see here filmed some inspiring episodes in the life of one of the world's greatest naval heroes and explorers, Sir Francis Drake. He it was who, while playing a game of bowls at Plymouth Hoe, Devon, coolly and jocularly insisted upon finishing his game, in spite of the appearance in the English Channel of the then all-powerful Spanish Armada. This inteprid sea dog then put to sea and made history by putting to rout the boasted "Invincible Armada of Spain."

Drake's love romance is enthralling and exciting to a degree. His first meeting with the beautiful Elizabeth Syderham takes place outside the gates of the city, on his triumphant return from a foreign expedition. The big-hearted, strong and impetuous fellow is struck by the maidenly pride and graceful bearing of the fair Elizabeth, who is standing on the forefront of the cheering throng. His wooing of the "layde faire" is characteristic of a gallant sea dog of the period. Determined to win her, he forces an entrance to the grounds of the rambling old home of his heart's desire and follows her to a quiet, secluded spot. She does not favor Drake's impetuosity at first, but, relenting, gives him a full red rose as a token of her regard. Another aspirant for Elizabeth's hand in the person of Sir John Doughty, appears on the scene. He, a friend of long standing to Elizabeth's father, says he will brook no interference from a "common sailor." Amid the rustic beauties of an Elizabethan garden Doughty comes to woo Elizabeth, but meets with scant encouragement. Thus embittered, he plans to rid himself of his rival by foul means. Obtaining assistance from those typical roughnecks of the period, he instructs them to lay in wait and to assassinate Drake. Meanwhile the latter is summoned upon a special mission by Queen Elizabeth, and, wise in his generation, he persuades his beloved to secretly wed him before he sails. Everything is arranged. Elizabeth, faithful to her tryst, steals away from her home under the protection of her bold lover. Their footsteps are dogged by Doughty, however, who, at a quiet spot near the quay, signals to his band of assassins and, with drawn swords they attack the "common sailor." A sharp, exciting fight ensues. Drake, enormously powerful, an excellent swordsman, and ever on the alert, clashes steel with his would-be murderers, one of whom soon falls before his trusty sword. A cowardly and one-sided battle ensues, but eventually Drake wounds another one of his assailants. Mad with rage at this unexpected reverse, Doughty lunges furiously at his hated rival and succeeds in disarming him. Quick as a flash, Drake bodily picks up the wounded and helpless assassin and wards off the onslaught of the other two. Seizing his only opportunity, with mighty strength he hurls the limp form at Doughty, who, panic-stricken at meeting such brave and stout resistance, flees for his life. Drake's ship is reached at last and a picturesque scene is shown of the wedding on board the "heart of oak." The ceremony over, Elizabeth returns to her home, unknown to her father, a bride.

On the day of departure Queen Elizabeth inspects Captain Drake's ship and, to wish him Godspeed, presents him with a sword, saying, "Take this sword, Master Drake, and we do account that he that striketh at thee, striketh at us," and so he departs.

Time passes. Sir John Doughty is insistent in his advances and Elizabeth's father favors his suit. Intercepting a letter from Drake to his bride, he descends to further depths of villainy by forging a letter conveying false news, that the venturesome seaman has been killed in a hard encounter on the high seas. Heartbroken by the news, Elizabeth cares not what becomes of her and, under pressure from her father, at last consents to marry Doughty. The wedding eve approaches, but Drake unexpectedly returns victorious and triumphant, and is greeted by the populace with unbounded enthusiasm. Calls of love and loyalty forces him to realize that his first duty is to his queen, at whose command he proceeds, with yearning heart, to the royal palace. Soon with pomp and splendor the magic words are spoken, "Arise, Sir Francis Drake." His honors thick upon him, he can think only of his beloved one, and he rushes off to seek her, who, unknown to him, is, with ever deepening despair, preparing for the wedding with Sir John Doughty. Breathless, but happy, he arrives just in time to find the fair Elizabeth about to sacrifice her youth and beauty at her father's behest. Thwarted and humiliated, Sir John is forced to see the all-conquering Drake claim his well-won bride and placate her father before beating a hasty departure.

Altogether a masterly, well acted and entrancing romance in three reels, taken amid the actual scenes of "Glorious Devon," Drake's native soil.

THE COAT THAT CAME BACK (July 30).—Uncle John sews ten one-thousand dollar bills inside the lining of his frock coat for safe keeping. Suddenly stricken and about to die, he hastily writes a will and leaves the coat to his nephew, John Clark. Clark receives the coat, but is unaware of the money it contains. He expected a fortune, and in his disappointment and resentment at receiving only a coat, he attempts to destroy it. His wife rescues it and pleads with him to keep it; but he won't, and orders her to get rid of it. She gives it away first to the milkman, and then to a hobo, but in each instance it comes back—the milkman leaves it hanging on the fence, and the hobo returns it because its stylish appearance gets him into trouble with the police. Mrs. Clark hangs it on the clothesline in the yard. A sneak thief runs off with it, but an artist who is passing gives chase and rescues it. He brings it back to the house and returns it to Clark. Clark won't take it, and compels the artist to keep it. The artist, in need of money, sells it to a second-hand dealer. Clark, in need of a frock coat to attend a wedding, buys Uncle John's coat from the second-hand clothier, but does not discover its identity until he gets home with it. He resells it to the clothier. The clothier sells it to a preacher. The preacher, carrying it home done up in a paper bundle, leaves it on a bench in the park. Some boys find the bundle and, using it as a football, kick it about the streets. In their fun it lands in Clark's front yard. Clark picks it up, carries it into the house and discovers it is Uncle John's coat. Angered at the persistence with which the coat comes back to him, he starts to rip it to pieces, and in so doing discovers the money in the lining, and thus finally comes into possession of his fortune.

GAUMONT

PALMISTRY (July 22).—This film is a distinct novelty and, in a manner which is interesting throughout, the pictures give the story of palmistry from its earliest beginnings, showing how it originated in India, when certain priests tried to interpret fate from the markings on the palm. Later these palmist priests were driven from their temples and took refuge in Egypt, where they formed wandering tribes afterwards called Gypsies (from "Egyptians") who read hands and predicted the future.

A very ingenious arrangement is shown by which hands may be read, a model being exhibited in conjunction with a photographed hand, lines tracing themselves out on the former which indicate the various stages in a man's life. Different types of hands are included—hands with square fingers indicate method, discipline, common-sense; certain types of pointed fingers indicate imagination, poetry, frivolity; and several other types are given, together with full explanation in each case.

All the lines of the hands are examined in turn, and the film ends with a representation of a lucky hand.

WHEN THE CARDS WERE SHUFFLED (July 24).—Young Baron Beljambe drops into a Paris restaurant for a light lunch and meets John Dupont, his old friend. Dupont, a newlywed, will not stay with him, as he is in a hurry to get home, but leaves his card so that the Baron may call upon him at a future date. Enter a wealthy American, Cornelius K. Dowd, accompanied by his charming daughter, Amelia, and Beljambe's disappointment at Dupont's desertion vanishes in a second. It does not take so skilled a boulevardier long to exchange glances with Amelia, and he passes her Dupont's card upon which he has written a request for an appointment. Papa is, however, not so blind as he seems, and before his daughter can reach the card papa has seized it. A hot altercation follows, and papa Dowd flings his glove in the Baron's face.

Next day two strange gentlemen call upon Mr. Dupont—Mr. Dowd's seconds have come to arrange the duel! Dupont loses his temper over their persistency, finally decorating one with a black eye and allowing the other to escape with an uppercut. The noise draws Mrs. Dupont to the scene. She learns the alleged reason, believes the story, and promptly rushes off to mother. Dupont, dashing after her, meets the Baron on the doorstep, explains where he is going, and engages another taxi. Beljambe, knowing what is wrong, charters yet a third taxi, and joins in the chase. Further down the street Mr. Dowd sees the Baron in his taxi and, believing he is attempting a getaway, the American makes a fourth in the swiftly gliding fleet of taxis. The procession eventually reaches the house of Dupont's mother-in-law, the young wife commences to sob out her story of infidelity, when the crowd of followers rushes in pell mell. The Baron sees that he must explain matters or there will be a riot, so he makes a clean breast of it, whereupon Dowd, tickled by the humor of the situation, laughingly relents upon hearing the true facts of the case.

PILOT

THE STREETS OF NEW YORK (3 Reel Feature).—The play takes place in New York City during the panic of 1907. Gideon Bloodgood, a prominent banker, is on the eve of absconding owing to the affairs of his bank being in a precarious condition. At this juncture relief comes in the person of Captain Fairweather, who has sold out his interests in the Mercantile Marine Company, intending to retire from the active duties of his profession. Fairweather comes to Bloodgood's bank—it is after banking hours, but he prevails upon Bloodgood to accept his money, amounting to $100,000, as a special deposit.

News comes that the captain who was to have taken command of Fairweather's ship has met with a severe accident and is unable to sail. His old employers prevail upon Fairweather to make this final trip. He is about to go on board when his attention is attracted by the newsboys shouting "Extra." He buys a paper and is horrified to discover that Bloodgood's bank is in a shaky condition. He rushes back to the bank and demands his money. Bloodgood and his assistant, Badger, who are dividing the money received from the Captain, are startled by the entrance of the Captain. He demands his money—Bloodgood tells him it is after banking hours, and to come the next day. The intense excitement brings on a fit of apoplexy, and the Captain falls dead in the banker's office. They carry the body out on the sidewalk, and circumstances point to the fact that the Captain dropped dead in the streets.

Bloodgood prevails upon Badger to go out West, and the Captain's money saved the bank.

Several years elapse and Captain Fairweather's widow and children are in destitute circumstances. The boy, Paul, tries to make a living selling newspapers, and his sister, Lucy, selling flowers. Bloodgood discovers that they are living in one of his tenements and he gives orders to his superintendent to dispossess them. Bloodgood is rolling in luxury and the family whose money he has stolen are reduced practically to beggary. In the meantime Badger meets with hard luck in the West and is broke. While the Captain was lying dead in the office Badger managed to secure the receipt that Bloodgood gave him for the money. An idea comes to Badger to return to New York and sell the receipt to Bloodgood. Badger manages with great difficulty to make his way back to New York City, and arrives at Bloodgood's mansion. With the receipt as a weapon, he makes Bloodgood promise to pay him handsomely.

At this moment Paul Fairweather, the son, in answer to an advertisement by Bloodgood for a servant on his estate, appears on the scene. Both Bloodgood and Badger discover that he is the son of the man they have robbed, and Bloodgood orders him from the house. Badger goes to a poor tenement, and in the next room, by a strange coincidence, lives the Fairweather family. Bloodgood follows Badger and discovers his abiding place, and being afraid that Badger will blackmail him owing to the possession of the receipt, determines to set fire to the house and thus destroy the evidence of his crime. Mrs. Fairweather becomes despondent over their unhappy situation and determines to end it all by asphyxiation. Her daughter discovers this and they determine to die together. The fire that Bloodgood started is now making rapid headway and Badger, in his room, is overcome by the fumes.

An alarm of fire is turned in and the fire department starts for the scene. Paul sees the flames and dashes into the house, resolving to save his family. With the assistance of a fireman the women are carried out to safety. Passing Badger's room Paul discovers there is some one inside. Bursting in the door he rescues Badger, who has managed to secure the receipt. Out of gratitude Badger tells Paul the whole story, and forces Bloodgood to make restitution.

Badger is about to call in the police and hand his old partner into custody when Paul, seeing the banker's great devotion to his only child, and thinking of the disgrace it would bring upon the girl, refuses to prosecute.

The story ends happily with the Fairweather family in possession of the fortune their father left them, and Badger becomes a useful member of society.

UNMASKED
(Itala)

Unique is the word to describe "Unmasked," the Itala three-reel film. In it is a scene which in conception is most novel and original. Striving to evade his pursuers, a man burrows into a huge snowball. Curling up within it, he rolls down a steep hill, moving, of course, much faster than his pursuers can move on foot. It is a highly spectacular effect and the ending in which the giant snowball rolls into a creek and is there dissolved, leaving its occupant struggling in the icy water, is of undiminished interest.

Another scene earning of the gasps of surprise that will attend its projection is when the fugitive launches forth over a deep valley lying between two mountains, between whose summits is extended a wire on which hangs a pulley, the same being ordinarily used for the quick transportation of lumber. To see this human bird speeding high aloft, holding desperately to the iron which separates him from eternity, is gratification supreme for the most blase sensation monger. If your spine is capable of feeling thrills, prepare to be thrilled on seeing "Unmasked."

The story is that of a young man, who through the efforts of a rival, is falsely accused of unfaithfulness to his business trusts. The main part of the film narrative occupies itself with the efforts of the misused hero, after having gotten evidence of his successful rival's guilt, to arrive at the place of the wedding before the girl and the heavy should be married. He has a long road and a rough road to travel. These adventures culminate in the baronial castle where the ceremonials are just about to begin. The hero dashes in, dusty, disheveled, and dramatically denounces him whose unmasking is soon complete.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE SPIDER GANG

Detective Hayes, who has for some time endeavored to break up the Society of the "Spiders" at last gets well on their track, but so great is their organization, that he is baffled at every turn. Help comes to him in an unusual form. First, by accident a servant of the "Spiders" drops his badge in the detective's room after delivering a letter of warning to him; and secondly, Lucille, the niece of Baron Stein, the chief "Spider," informs Hayes of a conversation she has accidentally overheard in her uncle's house to the effect that the gang have decided to kill Hayes at the first opportune moment.

As Lucille leaves the detective's house he is recognized by a crossing sweeper who is in league with the gang. He informs the Baron of what he has seen, but in the meantime Lucille has informed Edward, the Baron's son, who is in love with her, of her visit to the detective, and knowing the strength of the Spider's organization, he fears for her safety and decides on flight immediately. Assisted by the detective, they escape from the town after many thrilling adventures to get out of reach of the "Spiders."

Hayes, upon receiving a letter supposed to come from Lucille, is enticed by the "Spiders" to a cave in the White Rock. As he enters the cave, he hears sounds like thunder. His detective instinct tells him there is foul play somewhere, and he rushes back into the open and only just in time, as the whole White Rock is blown into pieces and stones fly everywhere. As Hayes rushes from the cave, he catches sight of one of the gang, and a most exciting chase ensues.

The detective sees that there are several of the gang in the vicinity of the White Rock who have escaped in their motor. Jumping in his own car, which has been standing by, a thrilling chase follows, revolvers being fired from the two cars. The car of the gang breaks down and they continue their flight by aeroplane. Then there is a most exciting chase with two locomotives and at a crossing the detective reverses his engine and shunts onto the same line as the gang. There is a great collision, but everyone escapes before the engines actually collide. The detective now dresses in the clothes of the driver and makes use of the badge which he has kept belonging to the gang. The gang thinks the detective has been killed, and do not recognize him disguised as the driver. He shows them the badge and tells them he knows where the two lovers are hidden.

The next scene shows them all going to the house around which the detective has placed several police. Here they are overpowered and captured.

This film contains a series of thrilling adventures, unprecedented in any photoplay yet marketed. The wonderful disguises of the detective are nothing short of marvelous all through the film.

Charles H. Streimer, manager of the Eagle Feature Film Co., was at the Exposition all week in the interests of the above feature which is in four reels and on which he has the State-rights. An exhibition will be given at the Unique Theatre on Fourteenth street, on July 27th, 28th, and 29th, at which all the exhibitors are welcome to attend.

Mr. Albert E. Cawood, photographer of the General Film Producing Co., makers of the Herald Films, left New York, Saturday, July 5th for the Arctic regions, where he will make a series of moving pictures of scenes and events in that country.

After an extended cross-country tour, Mr. Cawood will arrive at Nome, and will take charge of the expedition that has been "picturing" the Arctic regions for this company for the past three months.

Mr. Cawood and his expedition will make a series of motion pictures showing the true Alaska and other Arctic regions. The company will announce later the date of inspection of these films.

Mr. Cawood was formally with the Kalem Co.

HALLBERG A. C. TO D. C. ECONOMIZER AT THE EXPOSITION

Among the many interesting exhibits at the Grand Central Palace last week none attracted more attention than the Hallberg A. C. to D C. Economizer in the booth of the United Electric Light & Power Co. Many of the exhibitors who had been reading about the wonderful results obtained on the screen by use of this Hallberg Economizer, availed themselves of this opportunity to witness a practical demonstration. Projecting the picture on a plain muslin screen, in a brilliantly lighted auditorium, with hundreds of incandescent lights burning in the very booth in which the picture was shown, the operator manipulated the controller of the A. C. to D. C. Economizer, showing the operation under varying amperes from 30 up to 60 amperes. The unanimous verdict of all bears out every claim made by Mr. Hallberg for his A. C. to D. C. Economizer. This has already been amply proven by the number of orders booked for the device.

THE CALIFORNIA "HIKERS" RETURN

T. P. Orchard, and C. M. Kron, two California young men known as the "Hikers," under the management of J. V. Corrigan, have just completed a 4,200-mile walk across the Continent, starting from Santa Cruz, Cal., and finishing in Atlantic City, N. J. Leaving the office of the Evening Telegraph, Philadelphia, the hikers completed the last leg of their journey around the track at the ball park in Atlantic City establishing a world's record for one hundred miles of seventy-one hours and fifty-six minutes. They left on their return trip from the Moose Headquarters, New York American Building, Broadway and Fifty-ninth street, on Friday, July 18th, at 12:20 o'clock. The Hikers played all the prominent motion picture houses on their journey across the continent, showing some wonderful views of their experience and hardship incurred on the way. The Hikers are great boosters of the motion picture enterprise, and were given rousing receptions all along the route. The Hikers, who became members of the New York City Lodge No. 18, Loyal Order of Moose, will carry a message of greeting from I. W. Cunningham, national director of Greater New York, to the secretary of Los Angeles Lodge. Mr. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, fired the starting gun, commencing the long and weary grind back. Pathé Fréres will cinematograph the start for their weekly. On their arrival in Santa Cruz, the Chamber of Commerce and citizens will give them a monster reception, in which the whole city will participate. Leaving Santa Cruz, the Hikers embark for Tahiti, South Sea Islands, and expect to bring back and show the world through the motion picture some wonderful views and customs of a hitherto almost unknown race.

"FLYING A" FORCES GIVE UNIQUE COSTUME BALL

On last Saturday evening the ball room at the Arlington Hotel, Santa Barbara, California, was given over to ladies fair and dashing cavaliers in all the glory and splendor known to the elite of France in 1580.

The costumes were historically correct and are those used in a two reel production "The Adventures of Jacques." The incident created considerable comment among the town folk.

George K. Rolands, special scenario writer for the Universal, has completed a scenario on the "Book of Esther" taken from the Old Testament, and submitted same to Mr. Paxton, director in chief of the Biblical and Historical Motion Picture Co.

A feature of all Mr. Roland's Biblical scenarios is the fact that all sub-titles will be written in original Hebraic letters, with appropriate translations.

"A Prince of Evil"

RELEASED SATURDAY, JULY 26.

The story of an unscrupulous man intent upon marrying a wealthy girl who loves another man. The lengths to which the Prince goes, the compromising situations that he devises, make this a picture of swift-moving romance and adventure. This is a Vitagraph film in 2 reels.

"A Dash for Liberty"

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, JULY 30.

A woman detective is one of the interesting characters in this 2 reel Lubin picture. She fascinates the defaulting bank bookkeeper and all but has her case complete when he scents trouble, jumps on a locomotive and dashes away. The flight, the pursuit and the capture make as exciting a series of events as can be imagined.

The Reel Lesson of the International Exhibit

If the International Exhibit accomplished nothing else, it impressed upon the exhibitors of the country more clearly than ever before that the sheer merit of General Film Service, in single reels as well as multiples, is in a class by itself. The constant expressions of appreciation of that thought, heard on every side, were extremely gratifying to those of us who have been striving to leave nothing unlone that would make the standard unique in its excellence. It is a pleasure to nnounce four more multiple features that illustrate this idea perfectly.

The Girl and the Gangster"

RELEASED MONDAY, JULY 28.

EX-CATHEDRA

THE NATIONAL LEAGUE AND THE EXPOSITION

NOW that the Exposition is a thing of the past, it is well to ask, to what extent does the National League benefit by the wonderful success resulting from the Convention week? When I introduced the committee of the Exposition to the Grand Central Palace trustees, it was my impression (if my memory serves me correctly) that after the first $5,000 had been taken in, the League was to receive a pro rata percentage from all receipts. Again, if the figures that have been given out to the newspapers are correct, the treasurer of the National League should receive quite a goodly sum for the exchequer of the League, with which to form a nucleus for future work and propaganda.

The figures, as I have got them from semi-official sources, are as follows: Rentals for the space taken, $28,150; advertising matter in the program, $4,000; donations received from various manufacturers, including $2,000 from the General Film Company, $7,500; admissions paid at the door during the week, $15,000, making a full total of $55,650. Assuming these figures are correct, it certainly shows the great need for a yearly exposition, such as I advocated in my last week's editorial, and if the funds now available are handed over to the National League much good will be done in many ways helping forward the exhibitors' cause.

From time to time, so far as I can get the information, I will publish a statement of the receipts and expenditures relating to the Exposition proper, and a final showing when the full balance sheet is complete. The realization of so vast a fund as above quoted is perfectly wonderful, and reflects great credit upon all who worked for the cause. It is to be presumed, naturally, that some recompense will be made to those who devoted so much time to the work, and to pick out any single man for undue praise would be an invidious distinction. At the same time we must give due credit to F. E. Samuels, who took the full brunt of the work upon his shoulders and engineered it to so successful an issue, ably assisted by Chairman Hilkemier and Samuel Trigger, who were ably advised by M. A. Neff on many points leading to the success; and still again, the committee was ably assisted by Rich G. Hollaman, whose long experience and advice were freely given.

Many mistakes occurred in the arrangement of the booths which will be provided for in future expositions. The most flagrant neglect was the omission to number the booths and to put pointers or arrows indicating which way the numbers went. This would have been a simple matter and saved a great deal of confusion if it had been done. While the thanks of the exhibitors and booth-holders are due to the above-named gentlemen, ably assisted by their committees, praise must be given to the various entertaining committees both of ladies and gentlemen.

For the matter of the Convention, proper congratulations are to be given to the delegates who elected M. A. Neff president by 110 votes to 10. I understand an active campaign is now in course of operation to completely cement the whole of the country in one great power for the progress of Cinematography. A meeting is called for New York State to assemble at an early date, of which full particulars will be given in an early issue, and also a conference on behalf of the censorship question, when I sincerely trust the deliberations will be such as will aid the advancement of the business interests of all connected with the industry.

In addition to the National League, the new league is actively engaged in their propaganda work. From time to time I shall publish both sides of this question, maintaining a strictly neutral attitude to both leagues. At the same time, I sincerely trust a happy medium will be struck and an amalgamation of interests ensue at an early date.

The Bureau of Licenses shall issue all motion picture licenses granted by the Mayor, and, by the authority of the Mayor, shall regulate and control all motion picture theatres provided,

1. Applicants for motion picture theatre licenses shall file plans and specifications of the motion picture theatre with the Bureau of Buildings of the borough in which the motion picture theatre is to be situated, and must file a copy of such plans and specifications, duly approved by the Superintendent of Buildings, with the application for the license, which application shall be made to the Bureau of Licenses on blanks furnished by it for that purpose.

2. The Bureau of Licenses shall, without delay upon the request of an applicant, pass upon the location of the motion picture theatre and upon the character of the applicant requesting the license.

3. The Bureau of Licenses shall request the Fire Department, Bureau of Buildings, Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, and Department of Health to inspect said theatres, and the said departments shall file in the Bureau of Licenses, within ten days, detailed written reports, which shall include a statement of any violations of law, ordinances, rules and regulations, and any dangerous conditions. Upon the failure of any of said departments (excepting the Fire Department) to file detailed written reports in reply to the request of the Bureau of Licenses, the said bureau may disregard said department and in its discretion may issue a license.

4. Until the provisions of this ordinance shall have been complied with, no license shall be issued.

1. Plans—Before the erection, construction or alteration of a building, or part thereof, to be used as a motion picture theatre, there must be filed with the Superintendent of Buildings complete plans and detailed statement as set forth in section 4 of the Building Code. The plans must show clearly and fully the location and width of all exits, passageways, stairs, fire escapes, aisles, etc.; arrangements of seats, size of floor beams, walls, supports, etc.; the location and construction of the inclosure for the motion picture light and machinery, and for other similar apparatus; a diagram of the lot or plot, showing outlets from all exits, and also such other statements, plans or details as may be required by the Superintendent of Buildings.

2. Prohibition—Motion picture theatres shall not be constructed in frame buildings within the fire limits, nor in hotels, tenement houses or lodging houses, nor in factories or workshops, except where the theatre is separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors, and in no case shall they be constructed or operated above or below the ground floor of any building.

3. Exits and Courts—All such buildings must be provided on the main floor of the theatre with at least two separate exits, one of which shall be in the front and the other in the rear, both leading to unobstructed outlets on the street. Where the main floor of the theatre accommodates more than 300 people there shall be at least three such exits, the aggregate width in feet of such exits shall not be less than one-twentieth of the number of persons to be accommodated thereby. No exits shall be less than 5 feet in width, and there shall be a main exit not less than 10 feet in total width.

In all such buildings to be erected or to be altered so as to be used for a motion picture theatre, if unobstructed exit to a street cannot be provided at the rear of such buildings, as herein specified, either an open court or a fireproof passage or corridor must be provided from rear exit to the street front of at least the following width: 4 feet in the clear for theatres accommodating 100 persons or less; for every additional 100 persons the width to be increased 8 inches. Such passage must be constructed of fireproof material and must be at least 10 feet high in the clear. The walls forming such passage must be at least 8 inches thick, of brick or other approved fireproof material, and if there be a basement the wall on the auditorium side should either run 1 foot below the cellar bottom or may be carried in the cellar on iron columns and girders properly fireproofed according to sections 106 and 107 of the Building Code.

The ceiling of said passage, and if there be a basement, the flooring must be constructed according to sections 106 of the Building Code.

If unobstructed rear exits or exits to a street are provided, the said exit or exits must be of the same total width required for the court or passage above mentioned.

Said passages and exits to the street, as above, must be used for no other purposes except for exit and entrance and must be kept free and clear.

The level of the open court or passage at the front of building shall not be greater than one step above the level of the sidewalk, and the grade shall not be more than 1 foot in 10, with no perpendicular rises.

All exit doors must be unlocked when building is open to the public. They must be fireproof and made to open outwardly and so arranged as not to obstruct the required width of exit or court when opened. All doors leading to fire escapes must be not less than 40 inches wide in the clear, and shall be located at the opposite side or end of the gallery from other exit doors.

4. Galleries and Stairs—A gallery may be permitted, except in a theatre erected on a lot less than 20 feet in width, but it shall not include more than 25 per cent. of the total seating capacity of the theatre. Entrance to any exit from said gallery shall in no case lead to the main floor of the theatre, and the gallery shall be provided with a stair or stairs equipped with handrails on both sides. Stairs over 7 feet wide shall be provided with center handrail. The risers of the stairs shall not exceed 7¾ inches, and the treads, excluding nosings, shall not be less than 9½ inches. There shall be no circular or winding staircases.

The total width of the stairs shall not be less than 8 feet in the clear where the gallery accommodates 150 people; for every 50 people less than 150 which the gallery accommodates said width may be reduced 1 foot.

Stairs shall be constructed of fireproof material, and such material and the bearing capacity of such stairs shall be approved by the Bureau of Buildings.

Galleries must also be proveded with at least one line of fire escapes leading to an open court, fireproof passage or street without re-entering the same or any other building.

If the fire escape leads to a point in the court nearer the street than any exit there must be a width of not less than 4 feet in the clear between the outer edge of the fire escape and the outer wall of the court.

5. Fire Escapes—All fire escapes must have balconies not less than 3 feet 4 inches in width in the clear and not less than 4 feet 6 inches long, and from said balconies there shall be staircases extending to the ground level with a rise of not over 7¾ inches and a step of not less than 9½ inches, and the width of the stairs must not be less than 3 feet 4 inches.

6. Auditorium and Other Rooms—If the walls of the auditorium contain wood studs they shall be covered with either expanded metal lath or wire mesh and plastered with three coats of first class plaster, or may be covered with metal on one-half inch plaster boards. The joints shall be properly filled with mortar.

The ceilings of all such rooms shall be plastered with three coats of first class plaster on wire mesh or metal lath, or covered with one-half inch plaster boards, and plastered or covered with metal.

If there be a basement or cellar, the ceiling under the auditorium floor must be plastered with three coats of first class plaster on wire mesh or expanded metal lath or may be covered with metal on one-half inch plaster boards.

The basement or cellar under the auditorium shall be kept free and clear, except the space used for the heating apparatus, for machinery connected with the theatre and for coal.

7. Construction of Booths—Apparatus for projecting motion pictures shall be enclosed in a booth or enclosure constructed so as to be fireproof, in accordance with the specifications of chapter 756 of the Laws of 1911. The booth shall be equipped with a vent flue as prescribed in section 352C, paragraph 2, of this ordinance. Booths shall contain an approved fireproof box for the storage of films not on the projecting machine. Films shall not be stored in any other place on the premises; they shall be rewound and repaired either in the booth or in some other approved fireproof enclosure.

Where miniature motion picture machines are employed in connection with private exhibitions the requirements of the above paragraph may be so modified as to permit, instead of the regulation booth, an approved fireproof box, unventilated, and of a size only sufficient to properly enclose the machine.

8. Gradients—To overcome any difference of level in and between corridors, lobbies and aisles, gradients of not over 1 foot in 10 feet, or steps having a rise not over 8 inches and a width of not less than 10 inches must be used.

9. Aisles—All aisles in the auditorium and gallery must not be less than 3 feet wide in the clear. No aisle, passageway or space in the rear of the auditorium shall be obstructed by any camp stool, chair, sofa or settee, nor shall any person be permitted to stand or sit therein.

10. Chairs—All chairs in the auditorium except those contained in the boxes, must not be less than 32 inches from back to back and must be firmly secured to the floor. No seat in the auditorium shall have more than seven seats intervening between it and an aisle. The space occupied by each person shall be separated from the adjoining space by means of an arm or other suitable device.

11. Signs Over Exits—Over every exit there must be painted on the inside in letters not less than 6 inches high, the word "Exit" in legible type, and one red light or illuminated sign must be placed inside over each exit, and illuminated while the audience is present.

12. Floor Loads—The flooring of that portion of the building devoted to the uses or accommodation of the public must be of sufficient strength to bear safely a live load of 90 pounds per square foot.

13. Toilets—Toilets separate for sexes must be provided.

14. Fire Apparatus—Portable fire apparatus shall be provided of the following kind and number: Ten-quart capacity buckets, painted red with the word "Fire" in black, the letters 4 inches high, to the number of 6 for places seating less than 300 without a gallery, and two additional if there be a gallery; to the number of ten in places seating over 300 persons, and four additional if there be a gallery. There shall be two buckets containing dry sand kept in the operating booth; approved fire extinguishers of 2½-gallon capacity of the regulation Fire Department pattern, of which 2 shall be on the main floor and 2 in the gallery, if there be one, and 1 in the operating booth; 4 pound flat head axes, 2 of which shall be on the main floor and 2 in the gallery, if there be one.

1. Lighting—Every portion of a moving picture theatre, including exits, courts and corridors devoted to the uses or accommodation of the public, shall be so lighted by electric light during all exhibitions and until the entire audience has left the premises that a person with normal eyesight should be able to read the Snellen standard test type 40 at a distance of 20 feet and type 30 at a distance of 10 feet; normal eyesight meaning ability to read type 20 at a distance of 20 feet in daylight. Cards showing types 20, 30 and 40 shall be displayed on the side walls, together with a copy of this paragraph of the ordinance.

2. Heating—When the temperature of the outdoor air is below 60 degrees F. the air in the theatre, while an audience is present, shall be maintained at a temperature not lower than 62 degrees F. nor higher than 70 degrees F.

If gas stoves, oil stoves or other apparatus throwing off products of combustion are used to heat motion picture theatres, said products of combustion must be carried to the outside air by means of a fireproof flue or flues.

No radiator shall be placed in the aisles so as to lessen the width below the minimum requirement.

3. Ventilation—Motion picture theatres having less than 200 cubic feet of air space for each person, or motion picture theatres in which the outside window and door area is less than one-eighth of the floor area, shall be provided with artificial means of ventilation which shall supply during the time the audience is present at least 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for each person.

Motion picture theatres having more than 200 cubic feet of air space for each person, or which have outside windows and doors, the area of which is equal to at least one-eighth of the floor area, shall be provided with artificial means of ventilation, which shall be in operation when the outside temperature requires the windows to be kept closed, and which shall supply, during the time the audience is present, at least 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for each person. When the artificial ventilation is not in operation, ventilation by means of open doors and windows shall be sufficient to provide each person with 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour.

Motion picture theatres having more than 1,000 cubic feet of air space for each person and having outside windows and doors, the area of which is equal to at least one-eighth of the total floor area, shall not be required to have artificial means of ventilation, provided the air is thoroughly changed by freely opening doors and windows immediately before the admission of the audience, and at least every 4 hours thereafter.

No part of the fresh air supply required by any of the above paragraphs of this section shall be taken from any source containing vitiated air.

The area of outside doors and windows shall mean the area capable of being freely opened to the outside air for ventilation purposes.

When fresh air is supplied by means of ventilating openings, at least one inlet shall be situated at one end of the room, and at least one outlet at the other end of the room. Where exhaust or inlet fans are necessary, at least one of such fans shall be placed in an outlet opening. The inlet opening or openings shall be placed in the floor or within 2 feet from the floor, and the outlet opening or openings in the ceiling or within 2 feet of the ceiling. The inlet openings and their surroundings shall be kept free from dust so that the incoming air shall not convey dust nor stir up dust as it enters.

During the time the audience is present, the air in the theatre shall be kept continuously in motion by means of fans to the number of at least 1 to every 15 persons. Such fans shall be placed in positions remote from the inlet and outlet openings. No person shall be exposed to any direct draft from any air inlet.

The booth in which the picture machine is operated shall be provided with an opening in its roof or upper part of its side walls, leading to the outdoor air. The vent flue shall have a minimum cross sectional area of 50 square inches and shall be fireproof. When the booth is in use, there shall be a constant current of air passing outward through said opening or vent flue, at the rate of not less than 30 cubic feet per minute.

The specifications of the above paragraph shall apply to portable booths and booths in open air theatres.

Motion picture theatres must be kept clean and free from dust.

The floors, where covered with wood, tiles, stone, concrete, linoleum, or other washable material, shall be mopped or scrubbed with water or swept with moisture or by some other dustless method, at least once daily, and shall be scrubbed with water and soap, or water and some other solvent substance at least once weekly.

Carpets, rugs and other fabric floor coverings shall be cleaned at least once daily by means of suction cleaning, beating or dustless sweeping. Curtains and draperies shall be cleaned at least once monthly by suction cleaning, beating or washing. Cornices, walls and other dust-holding places shall be kept free from dust by washing or moist wiping. The wood and metal parts of all seats shall be kept clean. Fabric upholstering of seats and railings and other fixed fabrics shall be cleaned by suction cleaning, or other dustless method, at least once monthly.

Through its Motion Picture Inspectors, as provided in subsection 352b of this ordinance, the Bureau of Licenses shall inspect, subject to the authority of the Mayor, the character of exhibitions in motion picture theatres and shall report to the Mayor any offense against morality, decency or public welfare contained in said exhibitions.

All the provisions contained in this ordinance shall apply to existing places of entertainment, where motion pictures are exhibited under a common show license, in case the seating capacity be increased; and in case the seating capacity be not increased, all the provisions of this ordinance shall apply, except those provisions of subsection 352d, designated as numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, but the Bureau of Licenses shall have power in its discretion to enforce the provisions of said paragraph 3 of Section 352d as to exits and courts.

352I

Existing places of entertainment seating 300 persons, or less, where motion pictures are exhibited in conjunction with any other form of entertainment, must comply, before a reissuance of its license, with the provisions of section 109 of the Building Code, covering theatres seating more than 300 persons. But if such existing place of entertainment discontinue all other forms of entertainment except the exhibition of motion pictures, it may be licensed in accordance with the provisions of subsection 352H.

With the exception of paragraph 7 of subsection "352D," subsections "352A" to "352F," inclusive, and subsections "352H," "352I," "352K" and "352L" of this ordinance shall not apply to motion picture exhibitions with or without charge for admission, conducted under the direct management of educational or religious institutions, nor to motion picture exhibitions without charge for admission given or held not more than once a week in private residences or bona fide social, scientific, political or athletic clubs. Before motion pictures shall be exhibited in any of the places above mentioned, there shall be obtained from the Bureau of Licenses a permit for such exhibition. Before granting such permit, the Bureau of Licenses shall cause to be inspected the premises where such proposed exhibition will be held, and shall grant the permit if in its judgment the safety of the public be properly guarded, and provided that for an audience of more than 75 people all chairs or seats shall be securely fastened together in rows.

The Bureau of Licenses, at its discretion, shall specify the seating capacity for each open air motion picture theatre. Aisles must be 4 feet wide, or wider, in the discretion of the Bureau of Licenses. At least two separate exits, remote from each other, shall be provided, and no exit shall be less than 5 feet in width; for every 25 persons to be accommodated in excess of 300, the total width of exits shall be increased 1 foot. All exits must be indicated by signs and red lights, and the doors must open outwardly. Seats must be stationary, with backs 32 inches apart, and so arranged that no seat shall have more than 7 seats intervening between it and an aisle. The floor must be constructed either of wood with sleepers, or concrete, and must extend at least five feet from the seats on all sides, provided, however, that in the discretion of the Bureau of Licenses, a gravel floor may be substituted for wood or concrete. Adopted by the Board of Aldermen July 1, 1913.

Approved by the Mayor July 8, 1913.

SIMPLEX NOTES

Mr. F. B. Cannock, of the Precision Machine Co., left Thursday, July 17th, on the Adriatic for an extended trip to Europe, combining pleasure with business.

No doubt he will have a very pleasant and profitable trip, as the Simplex is as popular in Europe as it is in this country, having successfully competed with all the European projectors.

Our best wishes go with him.

The progressiveness of the Precision Machine Co, was demonstrated by their fine exhibits at the Exposition held in the Olympic at London and at the First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, held at the Grand Central Palace, New York, where the Simplex attracted a great deal of attention. The popularity of the machine is reflected by the par excellence of construction, which has led the best theatres and film manufacturers to term it as "the last word in motion picture projection."

AT THE VATICAN

To Mr. Charles Urban has just fallen the honor of giving the first Kinemacolor entertainment at the Vatican, and his Holiness, Pius the Tenth, who expressed his approval in no measured terms, has ordered the representation to be repeated at an early date. It may be added that Kinemacolor has been definitely selected (from amongst several competitors) to present to the world in life-motion and the actual tints of nature the daily life at the Vatican, including a great variety of cognate subjects such as the Pilgrimage to Lourdes, the Blessing of the Sea at Malta, and finally, the Papal Benediction to the people.

DAVID MILES
Director Kinemacolor Players.

GEORGE A. MAGIE WITH THE UNIVERSAL

Mr. George A. Magie, who is one of the best known and popular men in the film industry, has joined the Universal forces as special representative to the exchange exhibiting interests.

We cannot speak too highly of the sterling qualities of Mr. Magie and only voice the opinion of all members of the trade in stating that a decided acquisition has been made to the personnel of the Universal forces.

Mr. Magie was the organizer of the Solax Company and was one of the original members of the Film Supply Co. Afterwards he formed the Pilot Film Co. and was the general manager of same.

BENTLEY GRAND OPERA HOUSE IMPROVING ITS PROJECTION

Messrs. Nelson & O'Heron, Props. Bentley Grand Opera House, Milbank, S. D., have just ordered from Mr. J. H. Hallberg "The Economizer Man" a Hallberg 60 amp. A. C. to D. Economizer. Mr. Hallberg reports among other sales during the past week, one Powers No. 6a complete with Hallberg A. C. Economizer to Groberg & Stern, Meserole Airdome, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Powers No. 6a complete with Hallberg A. C. Economizer and full line of supplies to the Manhattan Theatre, 1059 Manhattan avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. Messrs. Keller & Sapphire have ordered for their new theatre at One Hundred and Eighty-first street and Audubon avenue, New York, two Powers No. 6a with motor drives and two Hallberg A. C. Economizers.

Dan Mason, the well-known character comedian who will be remembered in "The Man from Mexico," "Why Smith Left Home," "The Prince of Pilsen," "It Happened in Nordland" and numerous other big successes, is enthusiastic over his affiliation with the Edison Company. He created some amusement in his first picture by retiring to one corner of the studio when the director had outlined the first scene. He seemed mapped in a brown study for several moments and when asked the meaning of his retirement, explained that he was thinking out his character. The result was his clever portrayal of "Professor William Nutt," which amply justified his "brown study" methods.

A COMMUNICATION FROM MR. TRIGGER

Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York, Incorporated. Office and Rooms: 136 Third Avenue, New York

New York, July 23, 1913.

Mr. Saunders,
Moving Picture News,
New York City.

Dear Sir:—

Would thank you to kindly insert the following publication in your next issue:

At a special meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, held at the Union Square Hotel, on Tuesday, July 22nd, after strong denunciation of State Censorship as advocated by the president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and his refusal to submit a detailed account of the expenditures of the League's money during the past year, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Motion made and seconded that the New York Local hereby endorse the action of the New York State Delegates to the late National Convention at the Grand Central Palace in withdrawing from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and affiliating with the International Motion Picture Association. Carried unanimously."

Similar action has already been taken by several of the other New York State locals and a convention will shortly be held at which the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the State of New York in accordance with the resolutions of all of its locals will officially withdraw from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and affiliate with the International Motion Picture Association.

The officers of New York Local are as follows: President, Samuel H. Trigger; vice-president, J. A. Koerpel; treasurer, Grant W. Anson; secretary, H. W. Rosenthal; financial secretary, Adolph Bauerenfreund; sergeant-at-Arms, Robert C. Whitten; counsel, W. B. F. Rogers.

Yours very truly,
SAMUEL H. TRIGGER,
President.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

An Interesting Letter

LOS ANGELES author writes the following:

You make the statement that there are few writers supporting themselves entirely through their income from pictureplay writing. Without doubt you are right. This brings us to another discussion. Why not for the present drop the woes of the struggling amateur and discuss those of that much envied individual, the successful pictureplaywright? It is true there are few who may justly claim the title, even it may mean that he has succeeded in selling a number of his plays. There are a few who, circumventing the idea of millions who have written before them, can pass all the requirements of technique, studio wants, etc., and devise pictureplays of such striking originality and of such quality, as to stand out unquestionably among the mass of plays submitted by just as earnest brother writers. A man cannot keep on writing masterpieces at $15 per and have them close enough together to pay board bills. And that is just the point. Why, when a man finally succeeds in mastering all the bewildering technique, has studied, struggled, failed, studied and tried again, and finally succeeds in writing a pictureplay that is of sufficient brilliancy of idea and quality of workmanship to stand out amongst the weekly thousands, amongst the efforts of editors, directors, pet actors, contract writers, etc., why, when he comes to look for the reward of his toil does he find it to be of such uniform generosity (?) Why not a system of royalty payment, which, no matter how low the rate, would make the author feel that he was being paid in proportion to the amount of work he puts into his efforts? Playwrights for the legitimate stage can afford to spend years of labor on a single play, but the pictureplaywright, you know, cannot expect to spend more than just enough to pay his weekly or half-monthly board bill for any of his efforts.

If a writer can turn out such a masterpiece as is described by the above writer, he will be paid in proportion. However, we have contended that the laborer in the vineyard of pictureplay writing is worthy of his hire, and that better prices should be paid for good work. Some few get the good prices, others who write an occasional good story frequently fail to secure adequate financial returns. This California scribe, and he is a successful author, too, opens up a rather interesting argument on the royalty question. What do you think about it?

Editorial Etchings

Marc Edmund Jones is writing script lore for the Pictureplay Magazine and doing his work well.

The June-July number of The Photoplay Author received. It's a bully good number. Editor Letender retires from the publication, which will be conducted by the Home Correspondence Course. There is a sign on the front door of Epes Winthrop Sargent's New York offices. It reads: "Peddlers, book agents and canvassers keep out." They do!

Giles R. Warren likes nasturtiums. There is a beautiful bed of them right now growing in the yard of his pretty home.

George Blaisdell who writes such good trade journal stuff used to be a printer. He has nothing on us as to the printer part of it.

Horace Vinton, veteran actor, and accomplished journalist, was presiding judge at the amateur players' contest at the New York convention. A better man could not have been obtained. The would-be actors and actresses were good, bad and indifferent.

As to "First Readings"

A Chicago friend writes: "As a mere matter of personal pride, born of a desire that my scripts shall appear neat and tasty, I always see to it that they do not bear the earmarks of being previously handled. But in doing so, I do not imagine that the editors necessarily take it for granted that the script has never been submitted to any other company." Perhaps our meaning was not clear when we asserted that editors like to get first readings. We should have stated that editors like to think they are getting first readings. Maybe, not all of them, but many of them will give a script more attention if they are led to believe by its appearance that it has been sent to them primarily. They are naturally pleased to think that the story they are asked to read has not been sent from pillar to post before ending in their office. Avoid marks of handling on your manuscript and do not inform the editor that "Mr. Jones of the Squedunk Co. praised this particular story which unfortunately they could not use at present."

Yes, Write 'Em Down

Writes a Western scribe: "Your advice to write down your idea immediately, is mighty good advice. I have lost many a good idea by not being onto that method—at least by not thinking of it. The time to kill bears is when bears are around."

In the Pictureplay World

The above is a very interesting department for script writers and is ably conducted by E. M. Wickes in The Writer's Magazine, formerly The Magazine Maker. He has a number of good things in it for July. Mr. Wickes is also a song writer of established reputation and warns all would-be writers to be chary of so-called song publishers who swindle beginners through misleading advertisements. In the same magazine, Mr. Robert Grau has some of his invariably original work. He does not think that the theatre and its productivity lend readily to reproduction on the screen and surely not to the extent that plots may be conceived without resort to the technique and philosophy of the newer art. He writes: "I can name pictureplayers now receiving as high as $300 a week, not one of whom had ever found as much as one-third of this sum in their pay envelopes in the older calling—and it is the same with those who write the pictureplays. One man who sold the first ninety-two scenarios out of a total of 100 issued had never sold a manuscript to a theatrical producer." This may be true, but Mr. Grau could go farther and state that many of the successful script writers of to-day had some sort of preliminary training in the art of writing. And Giles R. Warren, one of the greatest directors and about the greatest script writer of the day, author of old Imp's "Fruits and Flowers," the idea of which is yet being copied, wrote many of the Blaney theatrical productions before he embarked in the film game. Captain Peacock for years was a story writer, and we could name many others. However, it is also true that many who never before put pen to paper succeeded as script writers almost from the jump.

A Plain Statement

Following an advertisement inserted in this publication some weeks ago that the editor of this column would criticise scripts, we denied the assertion. The advertisement was printed through error. Our denial appeared the following week. We are NOT criticising scripts for it takes all the time we can spare to criticise our own. Please do not send scripts to us.

Pertinent Pointers

Use a typewriter having a fresh ribbon.

You cannot afford to become discouraged.

We "fired" and "hired" many a reporter when we were "on the desk." We never even gave a graduate of a "school of journalism" a hearing. Many script editors feel the same way about graduates of pictureplay-writing schools.

Study the people who hurry past you. Notice different modes of humanity and try and decide their environment. In other words be observant and study human nature. There is a story in many a stranger. Try and discover it.

Remember the censors. Cut out the murderous and the suggestive. Shade all sensational scenes and carry them by suggestion of a leader or sub-title whenever possible. Better not carry them at all.

The latest text-book tells you how to become a moving picture actor. There is no opportunity for you so why spend your good coin for such a volume? Save your money for postage stamps.

The synopsis of a play is sometimes called an argument. Make your synopsis a real argument for a comprehensive reading of the entire play. If you can put it into 100 words comprehensively, so much the better.

Don't see how many scenes you can cut into your script. Stick to the twenty-five to thirty-five limits. If Biograph or some other concern wishes multi-scened scripts they can make yours over in the studio. The many-scened script is a detail of producing and not of writing, so do not attempt to cover this detail in your work.

Indoor stuff will soon be coming in again. Fall is the accepted time to drag out your indoor plots and get them going against the time the chill winds blow.

As in a play the construction of a moving picture play embodies introduction, development, climax and finale. An element of suspense is important. The prime essential is the idea. It is the essence of the plot, but it is of no avail if it provides no opportunity for silent acting.

No matter how strongly an idea appeals to you, ignore it if it be not possible. Try and obtain plausibility. Stories that are not plausible are rejected.

Custom Abolished

Some writers have been complaining that their scripts rejected by the American Company carried a receipt stamp on the front page. The custom didn't continue long. Good prices and clean handling is the American policy. Pathe used to smear ink all over manuscripts. However methods change and the methods of handling moving picture scripts have changed for the better. Prompt reading and courteous treatment are almost invariable rules these days.

"Nice Scripts, But——"

"He turns out nice looking scripts but he seems to have no sense of the dramatic," said one well-known editor in discussing with us the work of a certain writer. We looked over the work of the man in question. Almost at a glance the cause of the failures could be noticed. The scripts were technically perfect, too perfect. In his endeavor to turn out fashion-plate stuff, spaced and paragraphed to mathematical exactness and subtitled in red ink, the author had sacrificed something of importance. Can you guess what it was? He had sacrificed the punch, the dramatic situation that was vital to success. The editor had given this writer an idea—a good idea. He had carefully worked up his script but he had been so careful, so painstaking, that he had lost the idea. The script outside of its appearance was commonplace. Originality was gone. As an example of nice workmanship it was creditable. But the story was not there. It was only a weakkneed attempt at the story. There are too many writers puzzling about technique, etc., and not puzzling sufficiently about the dramatic sense. Don't spoil a good plot in its development.

Value of Titles

Mr. A. W. Thomas writes the following in the Photoplay Magazine:

The other day we criticised a manuscript which was entitled "A Little Child Shall Lead Them," and the "child" was a girl supposed to be fifteen years old. Another story bore the title "Won at Last," when the plot clearly showed everything was lost, not "won." Still another read "For His Mother's Sake," while the story dealt with the characters just opposite the title. How illogical such titles are. Recently we received a complaint from a writer in Pittsburgh, in which he said he had sold Solax a play a year ago and that it had just been produced under another title and "so badly cut up and so different from the original story that I could hardly recognize it." The studio editor and the director producing the picture knew what was best and most appropriate. Nothing is too good for a good studio, and why shouldn't the company alter the story or "flicker" a new title? It wouldn't be done unless it were an improvement. A good, short, and telling title to a good, bright story will help to sell it. Try it next time. Maybe some old scripts are lying around that could be rewritten and retitled and sold.

Grammatical Errors

We read an interesting argument the other day in which the writer warned aspiring young authors of pictureplays to be careful and avoid grammatical errors. Of course this advice, in one sense of the word, is good. We should all endeavor to use good English. However, it is not the grammar that makes the successful script, it's the clearness of diction and the idea. If you have the play with the punch and are weak on grammar, don't let that fact worry you. Send in the play with the punch. "John Batted Him One," may be ungrammatical, but it carried a strong scene we read once in script and which was afterwards filmed with great success. And it conveyed the author's meaning even better than a more genteel explanation would have done.

"The Order of Optimists"

"The Order of Optimists" boasts of several thousand members in good standing. We organized it about two years ago. No membership fees. President A. Van Buren Powell has been so busy with the automobile business lately that he has had little time for anything else. He promises a membership campaign in the early autumn. Come on and join; the pass word is "Optimistic."

Keep It Going

If you think your script is a good one keep it going. Maybe it will suit the next editorial reader. Keep looking for the things that caused the last editor to reject it, and don't be fearful of revision. Post yourself as to the needs of the various manufacturers. Don't select your favorite film company and just fire everything you write to that particular concern. Maybe your favorite company is not in the market for Westerns or Military. Knowing where to sell is a mighty important factor in successful script writing.

Human Nature

The editor who refuses your first script "doesn't know a good story when he sees one." But the editor who accepts your first story—well, say, isn't he in a class by himself? Just human nature sticking out all over the beginner. With more experience the writer will learn to appreciate that maybe that first editor was right when he rejected that script.

Hoadley's Boat Ride

Editor C. B. Hoadley recently rode the bounding billows from Gotham to Albany. He went up the Hudson after local color and got it in the shape of sunburn.

That "Photoplay Building"

A writer with a long memory wants to know what has become of that "Motion Picture College Building" which was so highly advertised by an Ohio correspondence school a year ago. There never was such a building. The humble dwelling occupied by the genius, who later skipped out of town, was the "Motion Picture College Building."

The Most Exacting Critic

The most exacting critic of picture play scripts should be yourself. If you are trying to pass along some strong and vital plot containing situations which have gripped your own heart strings you will be satisfied with yourself. If you are just "dashing off" something that "somebody told you," and think that any old thing will do for the "movies," you are not true to your self. Down in your heart the critic will cry aloud. And don't twist and turn to evolve "the usual happy ending." Try for real art.

THE ACTOR

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Rex Release)

I'M going East," announced Lloyd Warrington vehemently to his wife.

"Business?" she asked.

"Yes, but probably not what you think. Listen here: 'It is an unquestionable fact that the Western actors are receiving marked recognition in the East.' That's what the Mirror says. The article goes on to give a number of actors from the West who have made good on Broadway. I'm going," he ended with finality.

"But, my dear——"

"Yes, I know what you would say—it's a great risk and all that; but I'm going as soon as I can get ready. Can you pack my things this afternoon?"

"Of course I can, but I tremble to see you go. You've been in stock so long, dear, and have made a reputation and are getting a good salary. Why not continue here?"

"That's just it," he answered impatiently, "I've gone to the very top of the ladder so far as stocks is concerned and now I want to go further up another ladder. If I'm ever going to do it I'd better do it now while I'm still young."

"But—but things may be very different in New York. You may spend all your money for nothing and then be out of an engagement for months."

"That is all perfectly true, but I have to take the risk. A man never gets anywhere unless he does."

Mrs. Warrington sighed. "Very well, I'll pack for you this afternoon. Will you take the late train?"

"Yes."

The actor reached New York with high hopes. He rested one day before going among the profession, for he wanted to look his very best and be able to make an impression. An actor's body is a big asset and it must be kept in the most perfect condition if he expects to reach the top.

The second day after his arrival Warrington began the rounds. His faith was firm and he went to the first-class agencies. The agents were polite, told him there was nothing for that day but to call again the next. This seemed encouraging and for a week he did not lose heart.

"Why don't you try some of the other agencies? I'm going to," said one of the many actors who had spent the week at the same places as Warrington and saw the look of discouragement stealing into his face.

"Are they worth while?" he asked. "I'm not very well acquainted around here."

The man shrugged his choulders. "Well, sometimes you land something good through them. Nothing seems to be coming here."

"I'll try them, I believe, if you'll be good enough to give me a few directions."

The man did so and Warrington was soon making the rounds. At each place his heart sank lower and lower. There were so many others before him that he could scarcely get into the rooms. Always, when he did get close enough to the coveted railing to speak, he received the same answer, "Nothing to-day."

Another week and Warrington was almost in despair. After all his wife must have been right. It was probably better to keep what he had than to risk his future in unknown fields.

One morning, after a night of tossing and dreams he suddenly sat up in bed. "I know what I'm going to do," he exclaimed. "I'm going to take my nerve and go to see Lohman. He can't do more than kick me down the stairs."

Having arisen he shaved very carefully and dressed himself faultlessly. His hopes were beginning to rise again.

Many actors he passed along Broadway looked at him enviously, "Lucky dog," they said.

Lohman, the great producer, did not kick Warrington down the stair—he did not deign to come so close to him. "Mr. [illegible] e you," the office boy told him in a tone of [illegible] here was no use for him to come back.

[illegible] turned wearily away. He had no heart for an[illegible]rt. New York was a cruel place, surely.

As he stepped from the elevator some one slapped him on the back. "Hello, Wally! When did you blow in here?" asked a hearty voice.

"Gilbert Light! Well, I am delighted to see you. Who are you with now?"

"Doing comedy with Lohman. Been with him three years. Have you left stock?"

"No, not exactly. I came East to look around, but it seems hopeless."

"You're a heavy, aren't you? Have you seen Lohman?"

Warrington smiled bitterly. "I just came from his office. He wouldn't see me. Never heard of me, of course, and thinks I'm no good. It may sound conceited, Gilly, but I know I'm worth a dozen of some they have on Broadway. If I only had a chance to show what I can do."

"By Jove, I'll get you an interview with Lohman. He's just making up the cast of a new play and there's a part in it that would just suit you. I'll see him to-day about it."

So enthusiastic was Light that Warrington's courage once more rose.

True to his word, the old friend spoke to Mr. Lohman of the Western actor. So glowing were his accounts of his friend's work that the producer was glad to see him.

"You have never played on Broadway?" Warrington was asked.

He answered frankly. "No, I never have, but it is only because I have never tried to, I think."

Lohman looked him over carefully as though he were a horse to be purchased. "You are just the right type for a new play I am just about to begin rehearsing. I think I'll give you a try. Suppose you come to rehearsal to-morrow at eleven."

Warrington could scarcely conceal his great joy as he took the part handed him. "I hope I may be able to repay your kindness," he said to Light as they were leaving the office.

"Don't mention it, Wally. You'd do as much for me if you could and I needed it. I'm coming 'round to-morrow to see how things go at rehearsal. You just keep your nerve and your belief in yourself and everything's all right. We have to be conceited in this profession, you know."

Warrington laughed. "I guess you're right."

"Say, Wally," Light said as they were separating, "I'll run 'round this evening and give you a few pointers on the part as to what would make a hit with Lohman if you say so."

"Thanks. Come by all means. I'm going 'round to the room to look it over now."

"So long. Eight o'clock."

Warrington went to his tiny third floor room and sat down to read over the precious part. So absorbed was he in the dreams it augured up that he forgot that there was such a thing as dinner.

At seven o'clock there was a tapping at the door. Warrington opened it to find his landlady with a note for him. He tore it open and read:

"Dear Mr. Warrington:

"I greatly regret that the author of the play is not of the same mind as I. He is afraid that an unknown actor will not be strong enough for the part. Believe me, I am deeply sorry for this.

"Very truly yours,

"George Lohman."

Warrington buried his face in his hands and sat in silent misery. All his dreams had been dashed to the ground with one blow and he was broken-hearted. He did not move until someone again knocked at the door.

"Come in," he called in a listless voice.

It was Light, come to keep his appointment. When he looked at Warrington he stopped where he was and gasped. "What on earth is the matter? Are you ill? Have you had bad news or what?"

Warrington handed him the note. He read it quickly, then dashed it to the floor. "A man's word doesn't amount to a damn in this profession," he said. "Why, Lohman promised you that part without any qualifications. If he didn't have the authority he had no business to do it."

"What can I do?" asked Warrington.

"Nothing. You have no contract and if you did it wouldn't do you any good. They're all one-sided, and it's not hard to guess which sided."

"Well, Lohman has treated you white, hasn't he?"

"Yes, but he had seen me in a Broadway production. That's the trouble, you see; he isn't sure of you and he is afraid you won't rise to the big scene."

"I suppose it's that shooting scene that scares him. If he only knew it that is the very sort of thing I can do. If he'd only give me a chance I could soon convince him."

"Well, by Jove, we'll give him a chance. Get on your glad rags and I'll show you a way." Light was so enthusiastic that Warrington began dressing at once.

"Tell me what your scheme is, can't you?" he requested as he searched for the articles of clothing he wanted.

"No, just get your clothes on and I'll tell you as we go along. We're going to Lohman's club. I am a member and I happen to know that he and Ralston, the blessed author, are going to spend the evening there."

Warrington dressed as quickly as he could but his hopes were not very high. How Gilbert Light could influence men like Lohman and Ralston he couldn't imagine. In fact, he did not quite believe it could be done.

The two actors started on their way to the club and Light unfolded his plan.

"You're a genius, Gilly," exclaimed Warrington when Light had finished explaining his scheme. "You had better write plays yourself."

When they reached the club they walked leisurely around until they located their two men. They chose a table near them without seeming to see they were there and began a game of cards.

The producer and the author were talking earnestly in their corner and at first were entirely unconscious of the proximity of the actors. After a short time they turned to look in their direction. The two men seemed to be quarreling in tones just loud enough to be heard by those nearby.

Lohman and Ralston went on with their conversation. Warrington and Light played steadily on for ten minutes more. Again the older men turned their heads at the sound of quarreling.

"It is disgusting," said the author, "how some men can't play cards without getting into a quarrel. The club should not entertain such men."

The actors conversed in audible, angry tones for several minutes. "Let us go," suggested Lohman, "there is no reason why we should be so disturbed. You are right, such things are disgusting."

The two men left their seats and started toward the door.

"Now," whispered Light.

Warrington sprang to his feet and fired a revolver straight at Light. Light dropped across the table and lay still. Warrington turned and fled past the panic-stricken men at the door and made his escape.

Lohman, entirely overcome by the sight of such an act dropped, almost in a faint, upon a sofa.

"It's Gilbert Light," someone announced as they took the man from across the table and laid him on the floor.

"Who was the man who shot him?" was asked.

No one knew Warrington but Lohman and he was not in a condition to say.

A doctor had been summoned and while they were waiting for him the attendants busied themselves with Lohman and the actor stretched upon the floor.

Before the doctor arrived and just as Lohman was gathering himself together, Warrington entered the room and came straight up to the producer.

When Lohman saw Warrington he stared in amazement.

"What you saw you took to be a cold-blooded murder, Mr. Lohman," said the actor. "Well, it wasn't. Light!" he called.

The murdered man arose from the floor and stood brushing his clothes, before the astonished crowd.

"What does this mean?" gasped Lohman.

"I will tell you," said Warrington. "You took from me the part you promised me this morning because you were afraid I was not strong enough for it. Now, that part is exactly in my line, Mr. Lohman, and I felt that I must have it. I knew my own ability and I wanted to convince you of it. The only way was to enact your scene—the one you are most afraid of. Didn't you recognize it, sir?"

"Well," said Lohman in amazement, "I am astounded. I am also convinced of your ability. I even feel that I must thank you for convincing me." He turned to the author, "This is Mr. Warrington, Mr. Ralston. You have heard what he said; are you convinced that he can play the part?"

The author held out his hand. "Thank you, Mr. Warrington." Turning to Lohman he said, "Have you a contract in your pocket?"

NICHOLAS POWER COMPANY BANQUET

On Monday evening, July 21st, the Nicholas Power Company tendered a dinner at Mouquin's Uptown, New York City, to their associates, who had worked so hard to bring about the notable success attained by their exhibit at the recent Exposition in Grand Central Palace, New York City.

There were present Mr. Edward Earl, president of the National Nassau Bank, the treasurer of the company; Mr. J. F. Skerrett, general manager; Mr. Will C. Smith, assistant general manager; Mr. L. W. Atwater, sales manager; Mr. S. S. Cassard, purchasing agent; Mr. G. W. Landon, advertising department; Messrs. F. W. Swett, B. Bohannon, A. L. Raven, J. Abrams, A. J. Lang and F. Lowenstein.

A very elaborate and generous menu was discussed, after which stories, speeches and incidents were indulged in "with circumstance and much embroidery."

The festivities were presided over by Mr. Earl who was in a very happy frame of mind and oratory was the order of the day—or evening. Mr. Atwater gave an interesting talk on sales, and Messrs. Swett and Raven waxed eloquent. Mr. Landon started the ball with stories, recitations and a toast:

"All care to the winds we merrily fling
For the damp, cold grave is a dead sure thing.
It's a dead sure thing we're alive to-night
And the damp, cold grave, is out of sight.

"The damp, cold grave is out of sight
So we'll quaff the cup with many a laugh;
We'll play the game and press the fight
And push the Power's Cameragraph."

So many encomiums were heaped upon "Will" Smith as manager of the exhibit that words failed him when called upon for a speech. But he more than made amends by injecting into the affair a number of his friends of the "White Rats," consisting of the Black Brothers in banjo and piano selections; Elmer Jerome, in Irish songs; "Violini," of the Pink Lady Company, in selections on the violin; Sig. Piotti, in songs; Selzer Waters, in monologue; Mr. Dudley, at the piano "Bannon Watched the Building Going Up"; Will J. Cook, in songs, etc., and then some more. The services rendered by these gentlemen rounded out an extremely pleasant evening, and were very gratefully received by the Nicholas Power Company.

After the affair was over the wise ones adjourned. And the others? well, as Mr. Kipling says,

"That's another story."

Mr. M. A. Testa, formerly special outside representative for the Universal Film Exchange of New York, Fourteenth street branch, has taken charge of the entire business of the Dante Features, 20 East Fourteenth street, and will open a branch office in Central America. Mr. Testa will make features in Guatemala City, using Central American characters. Some of the Dante Features' big successes are "Parsifal," "Life of Dante," "Death Before Dishonor" and "Dumb Passion."

EXPOSITIONS toil not, neither do they spin.

* * * *

Well, good friends, we got back all right, at that!!

* * * *

If William Jennings Bryan would enter the film game he'd find $1,000 a month salaries few and far between.

* * * *

No film actor, with the possible exception of Billy Quirk, ever wore a hat with a bow in the back and got away with it.

* * * *

We shall not believe that winter has come until the porch swing occupied by the young lady next door and one other, after the picture show, ceases the habit of creaking until at least midnight.

* * * *

When we were seated in our beautifully appointed dining car en route from the exposition, eating a ten-cent lunch, the train became stationary right opposite a string of cattle cars. Many sniffed audibly.

* * * *

It was worth the price of admission to the Palace of Liberal Arts, New York, to see good old Horace Vinton heroically suppress a smile while trying to appear engrossed in the efforts of those ladies and gentlemen ambitious to become moving picture actors and actresses.

* * * *

We have our moments of bright optimism when we hope to earn enough money so as to be able to smoke the same brand of cigars so liberally handed out, convention week, by Epes Winthrop Sargent.

* * * *

We saw an enticing sign, "Turtle Soup To-day," on Broadway, and for a moment we were inclined to believe that Dr. Friedmann was posing for another animated weekly.

* * * *

While roaming the streets of Gotham the other day, thinking about Hal Reid, we noticed one of those new Balkan waists, and then we lost several minutes finding if our shirt was in the place it ought to be.

* * * *

We notice that every New Yorker in moving picture circles carries a cane, and those who do not raise cane.

* * * *

By the way, what has become of Comet, Shamrock, Mark Ditenfass, The Fall of Troy and Enoch Arden

* * * *

Every time John Bunny enters the Screen Club the S. R. O. sign is hoisted.

* * * *

That versatile writer, George Blaisdell, wants to know what has become of the old-fashioned fellow who used to eat sen-sen just before he took his best girl to the moving picture show.

* * * *

The way of the transgressor is hard, but the same rule can apply to the junk film.

* * * *

Ryan Walker, the cartoonist, made us a sketch of Eugene Wood during convention week, and we prize it highly. Ryan Walker is open for a series of Chautauqua dates in the Middle West, and there is no one better enabled to furnish meritorious work than he.

* * * *

It is worth a trip to New York to hear Benjamin P. Schulberg make a speech.

* * * *

William Petingale, of the Moving Picture News, is a hail-fellow-well-met and well thought of. He'll probably blue-pencil this if it's blue Monday. William is a comer and everybody likes him. (This includes the writer.)

* * * *

Mrs. Brandon was around convention week making pictures. Why she thought there was need for pictures we do not know, for she is a picture herself. Honestly, this little lady, made all the "backwoodsmen" feel right at home.

This is a big country, and it is now harvesting a big, non-partisan moving picture crop.

* * * *

"When I was a boy," remarked the visitor to the Moving Picture News booth, "the only thing I ever took seriously was castor oil."

* * * *

We took a long ride on a sightseeing automobile while in Gotham, and we tried to appear unconcerned when the homes of the Astors, Rockefellers, Belmonts, et al., were pointed out by the gentlemanly megaphonist. However, we could not help wondering where Carl Laemmle lived.

* * * *

While in New Jersey visiting our good friend, Director Giles R. Warren, the other day, we saw a house which G. Washington once made his headquarters. It was a three-reel house with plenty of sub-titles.

* * * *

An English author got a judgment of $750 for putting his name to a novel he didn't write. Needless to say he was not an author of moving picture plays.

* * * *

While in New York a friend of ours says he saw many wonderful things, but that Editor C. B. Hoadley, straw hat and cane, walking down Broadway, was a sight he could never have afforded to miss.

* * * *

We wonder if we couldn't induce President Neff, at this critical juncture in our affairs, to use his influence to secure the appointment of a commission to supervise and control prominent book agents who come around and inform us that we are widely known as a discriminating book lover in the literary circles of the East, and then proceed to sell us a sixty-volume moving picture set which we cannot afford.

* * * *

Talk about the coldness of the effete East, well, there's nothing in that misguided assertion. We know of a couple of tourists who were made to feel really at home while taking a little "flyer" in Gotham's filmland, and who left reluctantly, and who are grateful for the many good things pressed upon them and the many courtesies extended. It is only hoped that the Westerners are some time afforded an opportunity to take their Eastern friends to a log-rolling, barn raising, or apple paring. Easterners are assured that these are delightful entertainments.

* * * *

We have our moments of pessimism when it seems as if our prominent film exchanges spend most of their time explaining why an increase in the film rental rate is positively necessary.

* * * *

It seems strange to us that no enterprising young man has as yet organized an educational film company to insure the legibility of signatures scribbled on the Screen Club guest book.

* * * *

The rumor that man wants but little here below was not started by Mr. P. A. Powers.

* * * *

We always expect to recover from the Sunday comic releases by the following Tuesday.

* * * *

An educational picture on the economic value of the toad is promised. The cost of this picture will probably jump to ten cents a toad.

* * * *

Flattery is not always the soul of truth. However, if all the good things we heard recently are sincere there is need for the prompt exploitation of the crownless hat.

* * * *

While we are not disposed to complain, it does seem a little unjust to put the moving pictures under stringent regulations and allow the Ladies' Aid Society to go along just the way it always has.

A Philadelphia judge is trying to decide whether a rooster's crow is music or a nuisance. We hope the Selig Company has settled this question in their poultry film.

* * * *

A writer has returned to this country from Europe with ninety trunks. Why should photo playwrights carry rejected scripts about with them?

* * * *

A depressing fear has seized us that the Dumont, N. J., method of making brown gravy will never be shown in an educational picture.

* * * *

Far be it from us to knock moving pictures, but we do think there are too many deathbed scenes, too many representations of cruelty to children, too many masked robbers shown on the screen, and too much suffering of every kind portrayed. There is enough of all this in real life without adding the unreal.

* * * *

Ohio state is to establish a moving picture show. It will be for the convenience of the new Board of Censorship. The gladsome news has been disseminated that overworked and overwrought state officials can attend free. Thus the state, through necessity, will afford amusement for solons.

BEARING A SECRET

"Caprice," played by Miss Mary Pickford, is the production just completed by the Famous Players Film Company. And —here is the germ of this narrative—it was the caprice of the director to introduce a real bear into the picture. The bear was locomoted to the studio at Twenty-sixth street from Coney Island, and given his first opportunity as a film actor. All went well until the bear became homesick and began to long for the wilderness at Coney Island. He became unmanageable, untractable and unsociable. He announced in very emphatic language that he couldn't bear it any longer. Ernest Truax and Owen Moore, who are in the Famous Players, cast, tried to conciliate the ragtime model, and, the bear being very mercenary, thought he'd charge them for it. Truax and Moore navigated for the dark room, and slammed the door. Little Mary, seeing her opportunity, caught up a hair rug used in the set, threw it over the top of the dark-room door, so that it fell upon the heads and faces of the prisoners, and with her nails imitated the bear scratching on the door. Now, Truax and Moore are gallant gentlemen, and only less brave than firemen, but their spines contracted a heavy cold. When they were released (in two reels) and discovered that the pursuing bear was Little Mary, they decided that was a little over-bearing.

Ernest Truax, when interviewed, said he escaped by a bear chance, and Owen said he wouldn't do it any Moore.

The Edison Company announces that, beginning Friday, August 22nd, it will withdraw its single reel Friday release and issue a two-reel subject regularly on that date. The first of the two-reel subjects released Friday, August 22nd, is "The Gold Bag," a detective story by Carolyn Wells.

NEW RELIANCE STUDIO ON OLD CLARA MORRIS ESTATE

The Pines, the home of Clara Morris the well-known actress, has been purchased by the Reliance Moving Picture Company as the site for their new studio.

The estate, which was saved to her through the formation of a holding company that raised the money which prevented the forclosure of the mortgage, comprises about four acres of high ground overlooking the Hudson River at 262nd street, New York City. The line dividing Yonkers from Manhattan passes through the ground, and will cut the stage of the new studio so that it will be possible for a Reliance actor in New York to play a scene with an actor in Yonkers without any trouble.

In addition to the regular studio which will accommodate several stage sets at the same time, a large open air studio will be erected with the idea of gaining scenic effects not possible on an ordinary stage.

Work on the new plant will be rushed so that it can be put into complete operation at an early date.

ECCLESIASTICAL ENCOURAGEMENT

Bishop Welldon Pays a Tribute to the Educational Value of Kinemacolor

From time to time a number of distinguished persons, from royalty downward, have expressed themselves in the most glowing terms in praise of Kinemacolor from various points of view. The latest addition to the list is Bishop Welldon, of Manchester, England, who writes as follows in a symposium appearing in the Manchester Daily Citizen:

"It would not be right to pretend that I possess much knowledge of picture palaces and similar forms of entertainment. But the recreation of the people seems to me to be a subject of highest moment. I feel that hardly any service rendered to the community can be greater than that of providing healthy and interesting amusement. So far as I can learn, the operative class of to-day demands recreation of a special character. Picture palaces furnish entertainment to an increasingly large number of people. It is quite obvious that the value of such entertainment depends upon its nature. If the pictures are historically or geographically instructive, then they may do a large amount of good. Take the Kinemacolor illustrations of the Durbar at Delhi. One who sees them sees more than would have been possible if he or she had actually been present at the Durbar. Picture palaces have done a considerable good work by affording counter attractions to the public house and other dangerous resorts. It is much better that the working classes should indulge in these forms of entertainment than in alcoholic beverages. I think picture palaces, when properly managed, are wholesome elements in the life of a city; it is the part of intelligent citizens who believe in the possible influence of picture palaces for good to encourage them and be encouraging them to insure the maintenance of their beneficent character."

WOODS' SHOOTING MOVING PICTURES

Theodore Roosevelt, with all his influence, had to go to Africa and risk illness and death in order to shoot lions and other wild animals. Had he waited but a few years, he could have gained just as much experience as a sharpshooter and had more fun right in his own home town potting the same sort of beasts without discomfort or danger—thanks to the "Shooting Moving Pictures" just brought to this country by Manager A. H. Woods.

The shooting moving picture is the last word in moving picture improvements and promises to revolutionize the amusement world. It gives an outlet for the hunting spirit, with none of the attendant unpleasantness. It is educational—giving a wonderful training in alertness and without equal as an amusement. No other pastime has ever combined so much pleasurable excitement and novelty.

The shooting moving picture is a combination of shooting range and Cinematograph show. Moving pictures are thrown upon a screen which is made of thick white paper, behind which is an electric light of intense brilliancy, so that a bullet piercing the screen causes the puncture to shine out like a star. At the same time the film stops automatically, affording the marksman an opportunity to see how deadly his shot has been. The pause can be regulated from a couple of seconds or more as required, and then the film resumes and other "victims" come within range of the sharpshooter's rifle.

Nothing more fascinating can be imagined than to face a raging lion, knowing that at the crack of your rifle he will stop short, whether your shot has struck a vital spot or missed entirely, and then pass out of the picture to make way for more fierce beasts, flying birds, racing automobiles, aeroplanes flashing across the sky, charging soldiers and fleeing burglars.

The fascination of the invention lies in the fact that firing at the moving picture target is exactly like firing at the same objects in natural surroundings. Soldiers in entrenchments, beasts of prey in the jungle and the forest, grouse and partridge on the moors—all these can be peppered at—moving rapidly as they do in life and with the virtue that they must all stop dead for a second or two to show you whether you have hit or missed. At the recent exhibition at the Moving Picture Show, at Grand Central Palace, the shooting pictures were taxed to their utmost with patrons clamoring for a chance to enjoy the unique experience of firing at lifelike moving objects. A more severe test could not have been applied to this new invention than the continuous fusillade of shots that was poured into the screen—each shot making an unmistakable record without interfering with the progress of the exciting scenes that were being depicted. As a training for the men of the army and navy, the shooting moving pictures promise to be invaluable, but the great amusement public is especially interested in the fact that this is the most fascinating pastime ever invented—one that will revolutionize the moving picture business, by giving the patron a keen personal interest in the thrilling scenes depicted on the screen.

The weapon used in shooting at these living targets is a light but accurate rifle, easily handled by women and children as well as men and affording a perfect test of keenness of eye and steadiness of hand.

THE PICTURE THEATRE EQUIPMENT CO. EXHIBIT AT THE PALACE EXPOSITION

The attractive booth of this concern was unique, particularly so in view of the fact that they were the only supply house who bought space at the Exposition. Manager Edwards, with his usual foresight, saw the benefit to be derived in displaying a complete theatre equipment and was complimented on his excellent showing. One had only to inspect their exhibit to see about everything required in the fitting out of a perfect theatre. At the showrooms of the Picture Theatre Equipment Company, at 21 East Fourteenth street, can be seen the counterpart of this exhibit, only on a larger scale. They are showing a most attractive ticket vending machine and one that was much admired at the Exposition. It is handsome, accurate, rapid, easy to operate and of simple construction—just what the exhibitor wants. It seems that the idea of the mechanical vending of tickets is slowly but surely forming in the minds of the exhibitors and this little machine fully meets the demand for a box office system that guarantees speed, accuracy and privacy.

"THE GREATER LOVE"
(A Contest in Sacrifice)

Not caring to live unloved, a young man in the Itala film "The Greater Love" tears from his shot-riddled breast the bloody bandages and dies. Lovers have made a specialty of living and dying for one another since Adam and Eve went to light housekeeping, but they don't usually elect to die in order that the survivor may be free to marry the other girl or the other man, as the case may be. The spirit of the survival of the fittest is too strong in us—as bad as we are we're as good as the best of the rest.

A strong ending has this well constructed drama, and one to which its graduated points of interest flit with tense power. The director in staging this bit of realism had evidently consummately drilled his man with patience infinite.

SCENE FROM "THE GREATER LOVE"
Itala Feature Film.

The death agonies of him on the bed of pain are so natural that one can almost hear the death rattle.

Another of many good incidents is where the poacher dashes through the shallows of the river and through the brush of the wood to escape capture by the owner of the estate and his party. Culminating tragically is the ambush, when the poacher, now at bay, turns his rabbit gun upon the lord of the grange, his buckshot instead penetrating the youth who throws his body in the way to save the uncle so well beloved.

Photographically, dramatically, the "The Greater Love," is a strong subject. The Itala Company have furnished for it a line of paper commensurate with its high value.

MARIN SAIS

(Kalem Company)

MARIN SAIS, the popular leading lady with the Kalem Company at Glendale, Cal., is peculiarly equipped for the position which she occupies with such good grace. During her association with Kalem, which has extended over a number of years, this charming young woman has portrayed a wide diversity of roles, and her refreshing personality never fails to hold and entertain the patrons of the photoplay.

Miss Sais is a descendant of one of the oldest Castilian Spanish families of California. To those who insist that her name is Marian, she calls attention to the fact that she was born in Marin County. After a season in concert work Miss Sais came East and was featured on the Keith and Proctor Vaudeville Circuit. About this time she became interested in motion pictures and later entered into a contract with the Kalem Company.

Miss Sais is one of the most skilled riders appearing in pictures, and as an Indian girl she is without a peer.

THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET

A Drama In Two Parts, Produced by the Kalem Company

AT the close of the school term Kitty Hawkins, who has been teaching in the West, returns to her father's ranch and is startled to discover that he is implicated with cattle thieves. While Hawkins has a deep affection for his daughter, he fears that she will hinder his operations and forces her to accompany him on several of the expeditions.

Kitty protests and determines to escape from her unhappy environment at the first opportunity. Mason, one of the rustlers, annoys her by his advances and brazenly declares that a horse thief's daughter is none too good for him.

One afternoon Kitty sees a party of settlers crossing the plains and joins the party. Later the little band is attacked by Indians, and after a terrific battle Kitty is the sole survivor. She is found by Dan, the deputy sheriff, who carries her to the humble home which he shares with his superior.

When Kitty gains strength and would go her way the sheriff and Dan prevail upon her to remain and keep house for them. In time the two men realize that a deeper feeling than that of friendship for the young woman has entered their hearts, and while they maintain their cordial companionship, each resolves to win Kitty's hand.

The sheriff proves the successful suitor. When the happy couple leave for the minister's to be united in marriage, Dan realizes that he can no longer live with them. He therefore packs up his belongings and seeks a new home.

A shadow falls over the sheriff's home. Mason, the cattle thief and trouble-maker, appears on the scene and learns of Kitty's marriage. He calls upon her during the sheriff's absence and threatens to inform the husband of her antecedents if she does not provide him with money. The girl empties her purse into the blackguard's hand and bids him go.

But Mason has no intention of leaving the village. While at the country store he makes a slighting remark concerning Kitty when she passes and Dan overhears it. The deputy roundly thrashes the rustler and then goes to visit Kitty. She confides in him and he tenderly assures her that he will drive Mason from the community.

At that moment the sheriff enters and misconstrues the quiet conference which his deputy and his wife are having. Neither will offer an explanation and Dan permits himself to appear guilty of an unwarranted intrusion rather than inform the sheriff of the condition of affairs. The husband curtly informs Dan that he will secure a new deputy as soon as possible and that it will be foolish for them to endeavor to maintain friendly relations. Dan hastens into town and confronts Mason. He tells him in no uncertain manner that he must leave town in an hour or suffer the consequences.

The sheriff is paid a large sum of money for protecting a recent shipment of bullion. Mason witnesses the transaction and follows the sheriff home. He sees that Kitty is entrusted with the money and determines to get it. When the sheriff leaves, Mason boldly enters the house and is about to overpower Kitty when her screams are heard by Dan, who is on his way to see that Mason has obeyed the order. Dan fires through the window and the ruffian pays the penalty.

DEPUTY SHERIFF (CARLYLE BLACKWELL) GIVES MASON (PAUL HURST) TWO HOURS TO GET OUT OF TOWN

Kitty, unnerved by the attack and shot, finds a note on the window sill. It is a message from Dan, addressed to the sheriff and explaining that the shot was fired to protect Kitty and the money. He adds that he has followed the Elkhorn Trail. When the sheriff enters and learns the condition of affairs, he concludes that justice has been done.

A PRINCE OF EVIL

Weakness for Gambling Places a Woman in the Power of a Rascal—She Is Saved by Her Sister—Love and Devotion Triumph (Vitagraph Co.)

THE leader of a band of smugglers, Prince Delamere, an unprincipled adventurer, learns that more money is needed to finance his enterprises and seeks for a rich and beautiful wife. Meeting Josephine Chester, he at once conceives an ardent admiration for her and determines that at any cost and by any means she shall be his bride. When he proposes to her, Josephine tells him that although she is free she will not for a moment think of marrying him. She instinctively distrusts the man and dislikes even to have him near her.

Georgia Rivers, the sister of Josephine and wife of James Rivers, a prominent business man, is obsessed by a passion for gambling, which has so run away with her that she is heavily in debt. She determines to offset her previous losses by a bet on a horse race and telephones to a friendly bookmaker, who promises to keep her informed of the progress of the race. While she is talking to him over the telephone, the Prince calls at her house, and as he is a frequent visitor there, he is not announced by the maid. As he is about to enter the room he overhears the conversation over the 'phone and hides behind the portières of the room. The horse upon which Mrs. Rivers has placed her bet loses and she is in despair. Being a woman of somewhat weak character, she dare not tell her husband of her losses.

As soon as she has hung up the receiver, the Prince enters and sees her in tears. She tells him of her difficulty and he offers to help her out, proffering her a check large enough to pay all her debts. At first she declines to accept the check but he tells her it is nothing to him, and she consents to take it.

Josephine is sought by another wooer, Richard Trent, whom she greatly favors over the Prince. Seeing this, the Prince determines to force her hand. He goes to her and, showing her the check, which has by this time been returned to him by the bank, he tells her that, unless she becomes engaged to him within a week, he will show the check to her sister's husband.

Trent proposes to Josephine the next day but she tells him that although she loves him they cannot become engaged. She tells him that there is an obstacle that unless removed will prevent their marriage, and so puts off the matter until she shall have solved her sister's difficulties. She accepts, however, Trent's invitation for her to attend the Rockwood ball with him and looks forward to the evening with the greatest anticipation.

When she asks her sister about the matter, Josephine learns the whole truth but Georgia begs her to do all she can to avert discovery of the matter by her husband. Although horrified at her sister's conduct, Josephine promises to do all that she can to help her.

Delamere does not wait until the end of the week before taking further action as he sees that Trent is making great headway with the young woman and fears that the end of the week may see the announcement of Josephine's engagement to his rival instead of to himself.

JOSEPHINE (EDITH STOREY) TELLS HER SISTER (ANITA STEWART) OF HER ESCAPE

JOSEPHINE DISTRUSTS THE PRINCE

The night of the Rockwood ball he telephones to the ballroom, telling Josephine that her sister is at his rooms, and that unless she at once consents to the engagement he will call her husband, so ruining Mrs. Rivers' reputation. Thinking to be able to save her sister, Josephine at once leaves the ballroom and rushes to Delamere's apartments, where she finds that the message has simply been a ruse to get her there and that her sister is nowhere to be seen. While she is on her way to his apartment, Delamere causes a telegram to be sent to Trent, telling him that if he wishes to know the character of the woman he proposes to marry he must at once hasten to the rooms of Prince Delamere. On receiving the message, Trent, who has already noticed Josephine's disappearance, rushes for a taxi and is whirled as quickly as possible towards the Prince's apartment.

Josephine attempts to leave the room but is prevented by Delamere, who, hearing a step on the stairs, thinks Trent has arrived. He seizes Josephine in his arms, where she is seen when the door is opened. It is not Trent, however, but Detective Manners, who has come with a warrant for the arrest of the Prince as leader of the smuggling gang.

While he is talking to Delamere, Josephine steps behind him and takes his revolver from his side pocket. Stepping in front of the two men, she threatens to shoot the first that mentions her presence in the room. Just as Trent enters the room, she steps behind the window curtain and so is not seen by him. After Trent has bowed his apologies and withdrawn, Delamere attempts to take a revolver from his drawer but is forestalled by the detective who pins his arms and soon has him securely manacled. When the detective moves the curtains he finds that Josephine has escaped through the window.

The young woman succeeds in getting back to the ballroom before Trent's return and when he comes in she begs him to take her home. Going to her sister's room, she tells her the story of the events of the evening and asks how it is all to end. Their conversation is overheard by Rivers, who has silently entered the room, and he bitterly reproaches his wife for her distrust of him. His first act is to write a check to Delamere for the money lent by him to his wife and then to congratulate Josephine on the high courage she has shown.

When Trent calls at the house the next day Josephine, in answer to his renewed proposal, tells him that there is now no further objection to their engagement, which is promptly announced to the world at large.

GERTRUDE McCOY

(Thomas A. Edison, Inc.)

GERTRUDE McCOY has devoted her talents and picturesque personality to moving pictures for the past two years, and is at present one of the most popular players in the company of Thomas A. Edison, Inc. She appears in the prominent role of Zulika in the Oriental drama "The Greed of Osman Bey." While Miss McCoy has the advantage of rare personal charm, it must be conceded in all fairness that much of her success as an actress in moving picture plays is due to her pronounced histrionic ability.

Dancers, slaves, etc.

IN the name of Allah, the Compassionate, Greeting:

Hereafter you shall learn the tale of Ahmet whose name is written in gold above the gates of the tower of Ilbrahim.

Osman—may his name be written in water—had an only daughter, Zulika, whose eyes were deep and beautiful as desert pools beneath the stars. Graceful she was as the young palms that sway in the blast of the monsoon and when she spoke, her voice was as the springtime song of the bul bul.

AHMET AND ZULIKA FALL IN LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT

When Ahmet, the son of the sheik of the tribe of Ilbrahim, came upon Zulika before the gates of her father's garden, his breath stopped because of her loveliness and he swore that she and none other should be his wife. And when Zulika looked upon Ahmet, secretly come into her garden in the vestments of a slave, she also swore that he and none other would she have as her husband.

THE RUG MERCHANT GROWS JEALOUS OF HIS RIVAL

AHMET WOOS AND WINS ZULIKA

Now Osman, Zulika's father, has destined his daughter to marry a rich rug merchant of Medina. And when the latter came into the garden and found Zulika in the arms of Ahmet, he was exceedingly wroth and hastened to Osman and bitterly complained.

Nor was Osman less angry. He bade his slaves seize Ahmet and cast him into a prison. And the door of the prison Osman commanded should be sealed that the supposed slave might die from lack of air. But Allah is good and even as Ahmet lay dying, there came one out of the desert to Osman Bey commanding him to release Ahmet, now, by reason of his father's death, a mighty sheik.

Osman in fear obeyed, and Ahmet, even as one arisen from death, confronted Zulika and the merchant on their way to be made one. Then Ahmet cast gold and jewels before Osman, saying "This will satisfy your greed. Oh, Bey, for I am Omar, the Rich," and Osman, fearing to disobey and struck by the sparkle of the jewels, gave Zulika to Ahmet and dismissed the merchant.

And in this picture you may see Ahmet and Zulika, yea even Osman and the merchant, as though they were alive.

THOMAS R. MILLS

(Reliance Company)

THOMAS R. MILLS, who has made a great success in motion pictures with the Reliance Company, had a presentiment that he could not go wrong in that field on account of the rather extraordinary coincidence with regard to the letter "M" in the early part of his career. After leaving Mr. Miller and Mr. Morton in England, Mr. Mills came to this country with Mr. Louis Mann with whom he starred three seasons. He then joined Mr. Henry Miller in "Man Proposes" for one season; for the following three seasons he was with the late Mr. Richard Mansfield creating parts in new productions among others "Molière's Misanthrope" and playing important parts in his repertoire including "The Merchant of Venice." Mr. Mills then joined the late Madame Modjeska's Company, playing such parts as "Mortimer" in "Mary Stuart," "Malcolm" in "Macbeth," and also in "Magda," then followed an engagement with Madame Kalish for a season and later he was with Marie Tempest. "Mills" is his legal cognomen.

After three seasons with Mr. Frohman, one season under Mr. Arnold Daly playing parts created by him, some stock and Shakespearean experience, Mr. Mills has again gone back with great delight to the letter "M," viz., motion pictures.

Nelson, Grogan's partner...Thomas R. Mills
Joe, a Reporter.....John Pratt

MIKE GROGAN, a crook, sends his daughter, Rose, to a fashionable reception with orders for her to ply her trade and get away with the guests' jewelry. Joe Emerson, a reporter on the Chronicle, is sent by the city editor to cover the affair and give it a big write-up. At the reception, Mrs. Vandermade exhibits her new necklace and has trouble in getting it refastened. Rose offers her help and when Mrs. Vandermade sits with her escort in the conservatory, Rose steals behind the palms and takes the insecurely fastened necklace without detection, except by Joe, who, standing out of sight, is taking notes for the paper. Joe confronts her before she has concealed the necklace and bars her escape. The necklace is missed and detectives are asked to search the guests, as all have made known their willingness. Seeing that Rose will be caught, Joe takes the necklace from her and returns it, the affair being dismissed. Rose hurries out but Joe meets her and, escorting her home, secures her promise to reform. Rose tells Grogan of her decision, but Spike, her brother, overhears and attempts to strike her but is prevented by Nelson, Grogan's partner, who is in love with Rose.

Later, Joe finds her a boarding house and calls to escort her to it. They leave but her suitcase is forgotten. Joe returns for it. Nelson has dissolved partnership with Grogan, and as he has been cheated, sneaks into the house and shoots him. Joe sees him dash out, and picking up the fallen revolver, the reporter hurries inside only to find Grogan dead. An officer hearing the shot, breaks in and finding Joe beside the dead man and with the gun in his hand, arrests him. At the trial Joe is found guilty and sent to prison. He declares his love for Rose and asks her to wait for him. Rose decides to save Joe and by a trick secures Nelson's confession to the crime. Joe is released and the lovers are reunited.

TEACHING AGRICULTURE BY MOVING PICTURES

Every now and then we see something about this subject but the wings of the idea seem to get clipped before it flies out very successfully. There is not a subject of rural life from the dusting of the sitting room to the building of a sanitary milk barn, but could be exploited by interesting moving pictures. It would seem that the Farmers' Clubs, the Granges, Neighborhood Clubs and every other rural organization, could well afford to patronize such a thing by arranging a circuit of their clubs whereby a good moving agricultural picture show could be one of the series of winter entertainments. July may not seem the time to talk about winter entertainments, but it has been our experience that procrastination really is a thief of Time, and if we wait till we want a thing before we reach out to take it we are very liable to find ourselves clutching thin air. Let's begin now and through all our summer gatherings encourage the idea of getting a moving agricultural picture show on the circuit of our winter club entertainments.—Mary A. Whedon in the July Farmer's Wife.

Lebanon, Pa.—H. C. Wentz, of 511 North Ninth street, has sold his picture outfit to Adam B. Kreiser and son Robert, of Myerstown. They have bought a building next to the post-office in Myerstown and have given the contract for the erection of a moving picture theatre.

MILITARY PICTURES

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders, July 18, 1913.
Moving Picture News.
Dear Sir:

About two weeks ago I witnessed a picture presented at the Army Y. M. C. A. at Texas City, Tex., to some 2,000 soldiers, part of the present mobilization on the border. Part of the story was supposedly taken in the Philippines and a large part of the audience, like myself, had had their little turn of duty there. An officer was wounded and sheltered by a friendly native. Would you believe it—THERE WAS SNOW ON THE GROUND and the "Friendly Native" looked and was dressed like a Canadian woodsman. Ye Gods! Now imagine all this in the Philippines where snow is an unknown quantity and white natives as unheard of as oranges for breakfast on the 17th of March.

Of course the picture brought forth a scream but not the kind of scream the manufacturer intended. Moving pictures are shown nightly at nearly every army post in the service and such raw and unadulterated breaks as that have anything but the desired effect on those who understand. Time and time again I have seen military pictures with the most brazen mistakes as regards detail, e. g., officers wearing chevrons; enlisted men wearing officer's uniforms, carrying sabers, being saluted by other enlisted men, etc. I could go on with numberless mistakes of a similar nature, all of which spoil the perfect detail of most modern pictures.

I have been greatly interested in the steady improvement of the picture plays since their beginning, but have noticed that the military plays are 'way behind all other classes in their improvement of details, probably because there are so few directors who know anything about the military. How easy it would be to invoke a little assistance from someone who understands that part of the game and whose assistance would enable directors to turn out military plays that would call forth the applause in the way it was desired rather than because of its utter ridiculousness.

I am not writing this in the form of a "knock" at anyone in particular, but with the hope that it may wake someone up to the fact that their pictures are making a hit in the wrong direction and causing the firm's name to be a sort of a joke instead of a drawing card among the military patrons of the moving picture theatres.

Very truly yours,
S. W. FRENCH.
1st Lieut., M. C., U. S. Army.

The above letter is certainly called for at the present time. I have repeatedly spoken about the incongruous military tactics adopted by some of the film companies when they are producing pictures of the olden days and even of the present. I saw a film a few days ago in which the veterans wore the slouch hats of the present day infantry instead of the peaked caps of fifty years ago.

If the directors know nothing about military tactics they should get hold of some book on the subject or get some army man to instruct them in these tactics. As my correspondent says the pictures are ridiculous and I trust the above letter will be the means of stirring some of the pseudo directors to do better in future.

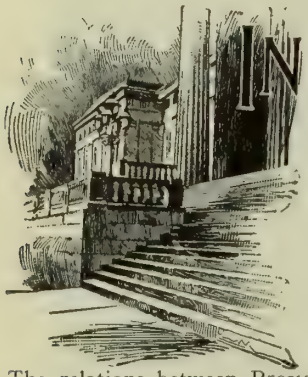
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City



In the Patent Office there hangs in the Commissioner's room a portrait of Dr. Wm. Thornton, the first "superintendent," of whom we wrote last week. It is the work of the artist Gilbert Stewart, whose celebrated portraits of George Washington and other contemporaries are well known and admired. This particular portrait was presented to the Patent Office in 1871 by a niece of Dr. Thornton, the widow of Hon. Isham Talbot, U. S. Senator from Kentucky. The relations between President Washington and the doctor were intimate, and in 1794 Washington appointed him as one of the three commissioners to survey and lay out the Federal capital. As heretofore stated Dr. Thornton filled the office of superintendent of the Patent Office for twenty-four consecutive years, and it is appropriate that his portrait should adorn the inner sanctum sanctorum of his successors, the present incumbent thereof being Thomas Ewing, Jr., recently appointed by President Wilson upon the retirement of Ex-Commissioner Edw. B. Moore.

Commissioner Ewing is well qualified for the position, having served as assistant examiner in the Patent Office for two years, an experience supplemented by more than twenty years of practice before the Patent Office and in the Federal courts. Being thus familiar with the inner workings of the office, as well as conversant with the interests of inventors and manufacturers generally, the presumption is that he will prove to be an ideal executive,—his successful career before the office and courts, and his natural ability qualifying him to fulfil the exacting requirements of this important office. Another proof of his qualification is that he is strongly opposed to the obnoxious Oldfield Bill, as clearly shown in his testimony before the Congressional Committee on Patents last year, which indicates his belief that the provisions of the bill would hinder progress and check investigation and development along new lines of art and manufacture. For instance, the following is epigrammatic:—"If then under a compulsory license clause inventors were handicapped in making improvements and in patenting them, then the patent law as so framed would not promote the progress of science and the useful arts, but would in fact oppose such progress."

Here is an illustration of the patenting of a mechanical expedient which owing to its simplicity seems obvious now that it is an accomplished fact. Heretofore reflectors of this class have been formed with flat surfaces for the support of a postal card or picture to be projected on the screen, and consequently the marginal portions of the reproduction have been indistinct because out of focus. Frederick E. Baldwin, of New York City, in Patent No. 1,065,496, simply curves the support to conform with the focus of the lens, as shown particularly in Fig. 2 of the accompanying drawings, in which A represents the curved cardholder, detachably secured to the body of the apparatus, BB sources of light; CC reflectors; E the lens, mounted in tube D. By arranging the card on the curved line A, the entire subject is brought to proper and uniform focal distance, and consequently all parts of it are projected with equal clearness. Furthermore the rays of light from BB strike the cardholder as shown by dotted line RR and are reflected into the lens as shown by dotted line rr, whereas were the back flat, as shown by FF the rays would be reflected as shown by dotted line kk and not reach the lens at all. This affords much greater illumination on the sheet than would otherwise be obtained.

Albert E. Jacobson, of New York City, has applied for the registration of "ARTATONE" as a trade-mark for photographic sensitized paper and plates, used since March, 1912.

WHILE at the present time presumably certain electrical societies having their headquarters in New York possess technical libraries of great value and completeness, still it is only a question of time when Uncle Sam will possess the greatest collection of such literature in the world, owing to the great advantage accruing to the electrical divisions of the Library of Congress, in that that Federal institution, having as its adjunct the United States Copyright Office, automatically comes into possession of every new book on electrical and kindred subjects that is copyrighted in America. Under the law two copies of each copyrighted work must be deposited with the Register of Copyrights, subordinate to the Librarian of Congress, and one copy of each work thus deposited, if of any permanent value, is immediately placed in the regular classified electrical collection. By this same automatic process of accumulation and selection the library secures as fast as issued copies of all the leading periodicals devoted to electricity and its various branches, and upon the completion of each volume it is bound and becomes available for reference. While the Library of Congress is not a circulating library in the ordinary acceptance of the term, the public is free to make use of the collections for reference work, and students who go to Washington to have the advantages of the library are afforded all the facilities of an admirably arranged reading-room. It is also possible in many instances for engineers, inventors and other persons who are seriously engaged in electrical work to make arrangements whereby any of the volumes in the Library of Congress which they may desire to consult can be placed at their disposal through the temporary transfer of the books from the Washington institute to a local library in their home city. Two divisions or classes in the library, devoted specially to electrical subjects, embrace most of the literature in this sphere. The Division of Electric Apparatus and Instruments has at the present time something more than 800 books, whereas more than 2,400 volumes have places in the Division of Electrical Engineering. In addition there are a number of works on electrochemistry, electrolysis, electrolytes, etc., so that all told the number of books on electrical topics is considerably in excess of 3,500 volumes.

WILLIAM GODSON LINDSEY, of New York City, in his Patent No. 1,067,785, states that he has discovered that triphenylphosphate can be combined with acetyl cellulose to produce a non-inflammable compound having great strength and tenacity, and other valuable properties; and the object of his invention is to point out to the operator a practical method of using or combining the two substances in making films and other forms of such compounds. In carrying out the invention an acetyl cellulose which is soluble in acetone is selected, a solution is made of such acetyl cellulose in acetone, and to this solution is added triphenylphosphate, either in solid form or previously dissolved in acetone or other similar solvents. The amount of triphenylphosphate may be varied in proportions from ten to twenty parts by weight to each one hundred parts of the acetyl cellulose, and the acetone or other suitable solvent is added in sufficient quantity to make either a flowable solution or a plastic mass, as is well understood by those skilled in the art. The triphenylphosphate while it imparts non-inflammability to the compound does not impart color or odor to the product. The product can be made in the form of films or thin sheets. Any approved method of forming films or thin sheets from a flowable solution may be employed. The flowable solution may also be applied as a protecting surface, such a coating possessing also the property of being waterproof. The final product may also be made in the form of a mass of any desired thickness. The patent is assigned to The Celluloid Company, a New Jersey corporation.

Color photograph, like the old-fashioned daguerreotype, is a non-duplicative positive, and it is doubtful if any means may be attained whereby reproduction can be accomplished upon a broad commercial basis; i. e., as easily and as cheaply as ordinary photographic prints. However, Vancamps, of Paris, has invented a process that solves the problem in part, although neither cheaply nor simply. According to the Bibliotheque Universelle three superposable negatives of the subject are taken by the electric light,—one through a violet screen, a second through a green, and a third through an orange screen. These negatives furnish three color positives on specially prepared gelatine paper,—yellow, red and blue, the complementary colors of those of the screens. The yellow paper is used with the negative taken through the violet screen, the red with that taken through the green screen, and the blue with orange screen negative,—positive prints being obtained by placing the respective papers in contact with the proper negatives and exposing to electric light, which fixes the colored matter where the negatives allow it to pass. Washing removes the color not thus fixed.

The gelatine films are then detached from the paper, affording three positives—blue, yellow and red—in which each color has its own distribution, the relations of light and shade being different on each. Obviously by superposing these positives in accurate register, the gelatine being thin, and the colors transparent, a fine blended effect will be attained, resembling miniature painting. Any desired number of positives may thus be attained from a single set of negatives.

Apparatus for projecting pictures by means of sunlight is shown in the accompanying sketch representing the invention of Frank T. Wilson, of Stillwater, Minn., as set forth in Letters Patent No. 1,065,757. The device is intended to be placed in or near a window and properly surrounded by light-excluding curtains or cloths except the passage for the rays from the lens 33—the picture 27 and its rack 16, being positioned externally by means of the slide 12. The sunlight is concentrated upon the picture by means of the adjustable mirrors 26, 32, accessible through doors 23. The inventor claims a solar illuminator comprising a table, a slide adjustably mounted on said table, means for holding a picture positioned for illumination at the end of the slide, a cross bar on the slide, a plurality of mirrors mounted directly upon said cross bar to oscillate on horizontal and vertical axes each to throw a separate beam of sunlight upon the picture from below the horizontal limits thereof, uprights carried by said cross bar and spaced apart thereon, a projecting lens in horizontal alignment with the picture and positioned to project the same between the said uprights, a mirror mounted on each of said uprights and adjustable in horizontal and vertical planes each to throw a separate beam of sunlight upon the picture from above the horizontal limits thereof, said uprights comprising frame members and doors opening from the back thereof to permit access to all of said mirrors, said picture and said projecting lens.

Too much cowboy. Consul Chas. S. Winans, at Seville, Spain, in a recent report, states that motion pictures have become exceedingly popular throughout the Seville district, and those shown there have often a more than passing merit. Until recently the films of Pathe Freres, Paris, were used almost exclusively. Now, however, some Scandinavian and American films are also shown. American films unfortunately too often depict "Wild West" scenes, which are not understood and appreciated as thoroughly as European films, which frequently give entire plays, lasting an hour or more, or picture stories of such works as Les Miserables. For the productions the best actors and actresses are requisitioned, and the settings are extremely elaborate and artistic. Especially in summer are motion pictures popular, when one may watch them all evening in open-air restaurants for the price of a cup of coffee or a glass of wine. In winter the prices of admission to the motion-picture halls or theatres range from four to fourteen cents.

Edison has the reputation of searching for the true inwardness of things in general, and certain things in particular; also of being responsible for some startling innovations. What we suppose may be considered as in his lighter vein was the "wonderful" table ornament originated by him, consisting of an aquarium containing gold fish every one of which was a bright particular light unto himself. In other words the tiny fishes were all ablaze internally and their delicate bodies showed clearly the details of their anatomy. Each had been induced to swallow a tiny electric lamp connected with a battery by two hair-like wires passing out of its mouth. This method of obtaining inside information was undoubtedly brilliant and entertaining from an external point of view, but how piscatorially considered your deponent knoweth not—neither doth Edison—for thereon might hang a tale. But perhaps Edison's idea was, after all, only an adaptation, as we read in "Popular Electricity" that "The whale that bolted Jonah down

Was kept awake o' nights,
By hearing Jonah's frantic cry,
Turn on the 'lectric lights!"

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

William Wadsworth is still wondering whether Dan Mason really meant it or not. Mason swore solemnly it was all an accident, but Waddy is skeptical. The two Edison comedians were playing a scene in which Mason, as a dentist, was supposed to pull one of Waddy's teeth out with a pair of forceps that looked like a Panama Canal shovel. In some way Mason actually got hold of a few teeth, and when he yanked, Waddy came right up out of the chair with a roar of grief and indignation. It was a question of Waddy or the teeth, and he decided that he could still use the teeth.

J. Searle Dawley, of the Edison Company, it is reported, will shortly become one of the directors of the Famous Players.

After a short interim of inactivity following the filming of James K. Hackett and Mrs. Langtry, Mr. Porter, manager of production and technical head of this splendidly equipped organization, will begin a new series of features, engaging the services of other stars famous in the dramatic firmament.

Rumor has it that Tess of the D'Urbervilles, with Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske, will shortly be perpetuated on the screen.

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

It would be next to impossible to know from which kind of musical numbers to find those which would show up to best advantage for neutral playing. Such numbers are plentiful in music of all character. They can be very successfully used for the accompaniment of all descriptive or introductory action. I class all those which I find necessary for the musical setup of all pictures, other than those which I term neutral, as descriptive numbers. They are, in reality, numbers which I use to fill in the time between the important points of the picture which I intend to feature. I have classed my repertoire in the following manner and have found it a great help in setting up my programs in advance. It not only saves time, but with a little care you can avoid a continued repetition of the same numbers, as one classification will suffice to give you an idea as to its proper placing in any picture.

Until the present time I have found the following classifications a great help in setting up music for the pictures hurriedly, viz.: Parade or military marches, descriptive marches (light), hurried marches and gallops, rag twosteps, characteristic marches, song marches (medleys), standard waltzes, descriptive, long; waltzes, modern descriptive; waltz lentos, legato waltzes, Oriental or minor waltzes, popular song waltzes, polka and dance descriptive, overtures, operatic and standard selections, popular selections, miscellaneous foreign characteristic, descriptive and sentimental; Oriental and heavy minor numbers, Spanish and Mexican, descriptive and sentimental; Western and Indian intermezzos and characteristics, national music (all countries), sentimental (light), sentimental (heavy), descriptive or neutral concert numbers, semi-pathetic (light), pathetic (heavy, dramatic), plaintive, melodramatic, suggestive songs and choruses, suggestive standard song numbers.

I use the terms light and heavy in many instances to determine the dramatic or serious value of a number. When the melody of a number continues in the treble register and major key it must as a fact remain light in temperament, and you will find it next to impossible to obtain any dramatic or more serious effect. When the melody or theme of any number alternates from the treble to the bass and from major to minor it can safely be called heavy and is a very good number to feature in pictures that are intensely dramatic. This rule would not apply to marches, twosteps, rags or intermezzos, as they are, as a rule, neutral and valuable in descriptive playing only. Among the waltzes you will find all temperaments. Standard waltzes of the Strauss type are very good neutral or descriptive numbers. Those of the Waldteufel type in many instances can be classed among the legato or dreamy kind, and are always well suited to pictures telling a romantic story. They can be used as light sentimental numbers when it is necessary to get variety into your set-up.

Modern waltzes are usually short and I find them valuable for the opening or closing of the picture or when I require the number to be played hurriedly. Standard numbers do not respond favorably when hurried. Waltz lentos are, as a rule, serious numbers when properly played. Their seriousness depends upon whether they are of sustained or of light staccato effect. Oriental or minor waltzes are always heavy and are valuable for dramatic or mysterious effects. When played as waltz lentos they are quite often plaintive. The overtures, selections and other large numbers of varying tempos can only be successfully used in pictures of the strictly neutral kind, such as scenics, educational and topical when there is no suggestive action. I have been able to fit Italian operatic selections which were sweet and melodious to many dramas of romantic type which were void of what might be termed acting. Characteristic numbers do not require any study to place as there are not enough to make any great classification; these pictures as a rule depend on their characteristics to get them over, consequently, if you can retain the musical character in a manner not to make it tiresome you have done your duty. The concert numbers classed as descriptives, sentimental, romantic, semi-pathetic, pathetic and plaintive require an originality on the part of the player to give them a proper classification. Many of them vary as to their seriousness according to how they are played. It is not a good method to juggle with tempos, but among these numbers there are many which are very flexible and the metronome meter can often be doubled without marring the composition. The most important is to determine as to whether they are light or heavy. A picture made by a company of good actors requires heavy numbers at the feature points, surrounded by light descriptives. While there never will be a fixed rule to determine the exact number needed at a certain point in the picture unless the music is especially arranged in advance, still it is a fact that any picture musician making a classification of his repertoire, whether along the lines I mention or other methods, will never have the heart to play "There Will Be a Hot Time in the Old Town to-night" at the Crucifixion of Christ. Orchestra leaders with extensive repertoires I am sure will find such a classification valuable while it can not harm pianists to follow it.

LATE PUBLICATIONS

In a Red Rose Garden, by Billy Gaston. A sentimental descriptive number that will please. Is of the gavotte type and very flexible as to tempo, which makes it valuable. As suggested by the title, you will find it very good for pictures based on romantic love stories. Twilight, by Nat D. Ayer. A reverie of merit. It is a number very similar to the Red Rose Garden. Butterfly Ballet. This number is very good for the accompanying of light plotting action, as it is of minor theme, very suggestive of caprice. The number has a heavy temperamental effect and is more valuable for the reason that there are not many numbers of exactly the same kind published. The three above numbers are published by J. H. Remick, 219 West Forty-sixth street, New York City.

Spring Thoughts, by Gustave Salzer. A novelette in 6-8 that is excellent for descriptive playing in sentimental pictures. Is very melodious and not difficult. Numbers of this kind are an excellent relief from the usual 2-4 and 3-4 continually played in the average picture theatre. Suite of Four, by Theo. Bendix. Longing, meeting, parting and reconciliation. All four are excellent serious numbers. These numbers will immediately suggest their picture value at your first playing. You are always safe in getting Bendix numbers. Published by M. Witmark & Sons, 144 West Thirty-seventh street, New York City.

Some Smoke, by S. Romberg. A number of one or two-step effect that is different from all the others and very catchy. Is of French style and while it leads off in minor it is strictly a light number, which is unusual. You and every listener will like it. Published by Jos. W. Stern, 102 West Thirty-eighth street, New York City.

THROUGH ANOTHER MAN'S EYES (Aug. 13).—Tom Norton is a lovable young fellow, but has a weakness for drink that eventually leads to his ruin. He is in love with Eunice Baily, who cares for him and does her best to break the fetters of a habit that becomes a vice. He has a friend, Wallace Elder, who secretly loves Eunice, but who lacks the personality of the dashing drinker, Tom. When they are passing down the street, Tom staggering along with his assistance, he tries to conceal the plight of the former when they meet Eunice. The sharp-eyed young woman sees the pair and has a better chance than ever to compare them. Wallace has an opportunity to recommend Tom for a position as night watchman in his uncle's factory. Tom accepts the situation, but burglars, hearing of his weakness, manage to get him drunk and then rob the office. The fruit of his folly manifests itself to his befuddled senses, when he finds the safe blown open and the office littered with wreckage. Eunice sends his ring back and advises him to try life in a new city. He goes West and is implicated in a robbery, for which he serves time. His poor old mother lives to welcome him back home after five years. He finds things changed, as he determines to face about in life. He looks through the window of Wallace Elder's home, and the scene that reveals itself indicates what might have been for him—so he looks longingly into happiness through another man's eyes.

THE MESSAGE OF THE ROSE (Aug. 2).—Alonzo, the timid, loves Chula, a beautiful senorita of sunny Mexico. Enraptured by her charms, and not bold enough to personally declare his passion, he sends her a white and red rose, requesting that she wear the red rose that night if she returns his love, but if her heart belongs to another to wear the white. Unconscious of his friend Manuel's passion for Chula he intrusts him with the message and the roses. Manuel, seeing an opportunity to be rid of his rival, withholds the message and the red rose, giving Chula the white rose to wear. That night at the garden fete, Alonzo seeing that Chula wears the white rose, accepts it as his dismissal. The next day Chula receives a message which she cannot understand, saying that, Alonzo, since she could not give him her love, has given his life to the cause of the revolution, and when Manuel asks her to be his wife, she tells him her heart belongs to the one who has gone. Manuel's first impulse is to confess his duplicity, but realizing it is too late, he leaves to join his command in the federal army, with his secret undisclosed. As the months go by, Chula despairs of her lover's return and seeks solace in a convent. Taken as a prisoner of war by Manuel's regiment, Alonzo, along with other prisoners, participates in a lottery of death, wherein those who draw black beans are condemned to die and those who draw white ones are liberated. Drawing the black bean, Alonzo is condemned to death, when Manuel, thinking to right the past wrong, sacrifices his career in liberating him, and asking forgiveness, confesses his perfidy and expiates his crime by being courtmartialed and executed. On his return, Alonzo's dream of love is shattered when he finds that Chula has consecrated her life to the church, his only possession being the message conveyed by the rose from the hand of his lost love.

WHEN SOCIETY CALLS (July 31).—Her husband's nightly engagements, for which he refuses to account to her, greatly incense Mrs. Bentley against him and she discusses the matter with her friends, who advise her to go and do likewise. A regular family upheaval follows and the parties separate, with the condition that their little daughter, Grace, shall spend six months of the year with her mother and six months with her father. The separation brings great grief to Mr. Bentley's father, a paralytic who cannot move about or even speak.

The first six months are spent by Grace with her mother, who plunges into a round of social gayety and sadly neglects her. When, at the close of the time, her father comes to fetch her, she goes joyfully to him and seems glad to get away from her amusement-seeking mother.

Bentley takes no more care of the child than his wife had done and she would have led a life of absolute loneliness but for her old grandfather who adores her. Grace falls sick and her father recognizes that she is in danger of losing her life. He at once sends for her mother who hastens to the child's bedside. Grace is very low when her mother arrives, but, remembering the manner in which her mother had treated her, she will not speak to her, but turns away her head with a cry of fear. Her father also she dislikes and does not wish to have him with her. The old grandfather remains constantly at her side, for she will not let him go away, feeling that he is the only one who truly loves her.

After the child had fallen asleep the doctor instructs the nurse to give her medicine as soon as she regains consciousness but the woman, who is wearied by long watching by the bedside, falls asleep and when Grace wakens she is not given the necessary drugs. The old man gives an awful groan, which is heard by the parents in the next room. They rush in, but are too late, however, for their baby is dying and passes away as they watch her.

United by their common sorrow, they resolve to begin life together again and to have more consideration one for the other. When they turn to the old man they find that he also has passed into eternity, happy now that he has seen the reunion of those he loved.

KINEMACOLOR

LOVE AND WAR IN TOYLAND.—The characters in this drama are enacted entirely by mechanical toys, requiring over 200,000 separate changes of position in photographing. The time occupied was ten months; each day averaging fifteen hours continuous work.

In the first scene the Prince of Slumberland, a toy figure, departs to court the King of Loveland's daughter. The Emperor of the No-Goods, another aspirant, is also on his way to court the Princess of Loveland. The royal lovers arrive simultaneously before the King of Loveland, who decrees that they must fight a duel in aeroplanes for the hand of the Princess.

The Emperor's aeroplane is damaged, but, protected by his aeronautic helmet, the Emperor himself is unhurt. The Prince is proclaimed the victor.

The Princess is blowing the seeds of an enormous dandelion and asking the old question: "He loves, he loves me not." While she is thus engaged she is abducted by the Emperor. Whilst crossing the wild lands they are attacked by toy animals. The Prince and the King come with an army to rescue the Princess. Then takes place the battle of Hobby-horse Pass. The Emperor retreats to the capital of No-Goods. This edifice introduces all the devices by which time may be frittered away—cards, dice, dominoes, etc. The effect is most picturesque. The Prince in revenge leads his aerial fleet to destroy the capital. The Emperor attempts to escape by a secret passage, but he is captured and as a punishment for his misdeeds he is fired from a cannon into the burning city.

Upon their return home the Prince and Princess are married, after which the victors offer up a prayer to Santa Claus, whose figure is seen in the background.

MASQUERADING IN BEAR CANYON (Aug. 7).—New Mexico abounds with wonderful hills and canyons and the climate is so beneficial to health that it is not strange that people afflicted should be ordered to that country by their physicians.

Our story deals with the lives of city people who visit Bear Canyon in the Sandia Mountains of New Mexico, and while there meet and grow attached to the rugged, honest inhabitants who may have come there a little earlier in life for the same reason and have been benefited and decided to make that their permanent home.

Mr. John Brandon, a man of wealth, was told by his family physician that his daughter Alice was in declining health and that he, Brandon, must take her to New Mexico, where the climate might bring her back to health and strength. Alice is secretly betrothed to her father's clerk and when her father finds this out it is an added reason why he should try to get his daughter away from the city. The journey is made.

Dr. Rice, in Albuquerque, New Mexico, advises a three weeks' stay in Bear Canyon, a distance of twenty miles from the city. The father therefore makes the arrangements. Later they find themselves in the rugged, rocky canyon. Alice is assisted to the topmost peak and a little sun parlor is arranged where she spends her days reading and enjoying God's wonderful sunshine in the most rugged and beautiful country in the whole United States.

The daughter of a goat herder, himself an invalid, and only a few years earlier compelled to come to the same place for his health, while out with her herd of goats, sees the city girl in her flowing white robe, is startled, goes home and tells her parents. They explain to her that it must be some tourist that has by chance come to this part of the country.

The following day she starts out again on her daily jaunt over the hills with the goats. The girls meet and become firm friends. The city girl decides it would be a fine prank to change clothes with the goat girl and wander off among the rocks with the goats, leaving the goat girl to act the part of the invalid. They decide to keep their secret for fear it might worry Alice's father.

Later Dr. Seth, the nephew of Dr. Rice, visits his uncle and, as Dr. Rice is very busy, the nephew is sent out to Bear Canyon to see how the invalid is getting along. The father wishes to take him up to the hills but the doctor advises that he can find the patient without disturbing the father. He struggles to the top of the hill and, looking over, sees the goat girl, who he supposes is Alice, the daughter of Mr. Brandon. The goat girl is very much excited—the doctor very much interested in the beautiful girl. He asks her how she is feeling; she says very sick. The doctor feels her pulse, asks her to show her tongue, he finds nothing wrong, and feels that there is a mistake somewhere.

He goes away but finding it impossible to forget the little girl on the rocks, comes back the following day, and as the girls have met again and changed clothes the doctor finds, as he supposes, Alice Brandon. This masquerading is going on for some little time, the doctor becoming more and more infatuated with his supposed patient. The city girl understands the situation, and it has afforded her a lot of enjoyment.

Alice's sweetheart is tired of being alone. Later he arrives on the scene and, meeting Dr. Seth, who is just about to start out from Albuquerque to Bear Canyon, he is invited by Dr. Seth to ride with him. When the doctor finds that he is the sweetheart of Alice Brandon he freezes up and is none too courteous. This is all explained away when the two young men reach the summit of the hill in Bear Canyon and find the girls have been masquerading. Alice's health has been greatly improved and the meeting of her sweetheart makes her supremely happy. The doctor's love was true blue, and the little goat girl finds that he loves her for herself, regardless of her station in life. Everything, therefore, is happiness.

A MODERN ROMANCE (Aug. 7).—Edward Markham, son of a wealthy and retired financier, and erstwhile young man about town, devotes practically his whole time to gambling and similar pursuits. Stricken ill one evening at his club, he is rushed to a hospital and there operated upon for appendicitis. "Specialed" by a winsome nurse (Hawthorne), they fall in love with one another. Upon his return to his father's house he makes known his attachment, but encounters the latter's opposition to the match on the grounds that she is beneath him in station. Markham, Sr., threatens to cut his son off without a penny if he persists in his determination to marry the nurse, and upon Ned's avowal that he will do so, the family lawyer is called in and changes in the old man's will are effected accordingly. Markham marries Nurse Hawthorne and five years pass away. At the expiration of this time Ned has become a member of the firm of Bayd & Markham, stock brokers, and is in comfortable circumstances. About this time he begins to dabble in stocks. At first successful, he one day risks all, and loses all. Despondent, he returns home and is about to end his life. His child, coming into the room with a telegram at the moment he is about to pull the trigger, saves his life. The "wire" announces the serious and sudden illness of his father; "paralysis threatened." A bright idea occurs to him. He interviews the family physician and is successful in having his wife installed as nurse for his father under the nom de plume of "Nurse Millidge." Markham, Sr., is nursed round to his normal state of health in the course of a couple of months, but in the meantime he has become so attached to Nurse Millidge that when she suggests leaving he will not entertain the idea, and offers to adopt her as his daughter. This suggestion effects the climax. Her husband and child enter to take her home and the old man, overcome with mingled emotions of surprise, shame and love, bids them stay. They form an affectionate grouping as the picture fades out.

NATURE'S VENGEANCE (Aug. 8).—Gertrude, a child of nature, lives in the mountains with her mother and her brother Dick. They are herb pickers. Jim, a stranger, comes and wins her affections, she turning from her mountain lover, Cooley. But Jim has no intention of keeping his promise of marriage, and when Gertrude appeals to him, rejects her and assaults Dick, who interferes in Gertrude's behalf.

The mother learns that Jim is going away, leaving his promise unfulfilled. He has started down the mountain stream in his canoe. The mother follows on horseback, overtakes him and, at the point of a revolver, forces him to return. A mountaineer parson marries Gertrude and Jim, the bridegroom's reluctance overcome by the mother's pistol. This accomplished, she orders Jim to go, and once more he takes to his canoe.

Dick arrives, followed by the mountaineers, whom he has told of his injuries, and who are bent on vengeance. The mother explains the situation to them and they abandon their quest. But Jim is not to escape nature's vengeance for his injury to her child. He is caught in the whirling rapids of the stream, his canoe is capsized, and his body carried down through the angry waters to the quieter reaches below.

Gertrude is left to forget the strangers and in time her reception of a little gift from Cooley shows that her future holds hope of happiness.

WHEN THE PRINCE ARRIVES (Aug. 7).—May, the daughter of a comfortably fixed farmer, being of a romantic turn of mind, gives considerable time to reading love stories and fairy tales. Joe, the foreman of the farm, a frank, open-hearted youth, makes known his love for her. May, who finds him short on romance and scarcely in accord with her ideal of a lover, gently resents his advances.

One day a circus comes to town and in the preparation of the show Bob and Frank, both acrobats, quarrel, and the latter is knocked down and left for dead. The acrobat, frantic at his hasty deed, seeks refuge in the open country, where he happens upon May. The romantic girl, impressed by the oddity of his strange array of trunks and tights, such an array as might become her imaginative ideas of a prince, listens to Bob's appeal for aid and she gives him shelter.

The sheriff and posse pursue the fugitive to the farmhouse, where they are thrown off the trail by May. She gives the mysterious stranger the necessary attire from a convenient scarecrow, together with a horse, instructing him to let the pony go, that he will find his way home alone. Bob grasps the chance of escape and gallops off, leaving the reader of fairy literature in a rather uncertain state of mind regarding her heart.

Bob reaches safety, throws the bridle over the horse's head as instructed, and the pony in due time arrives at the farm with a note fastened to the bridle. With beating heart May eagerly scans the message which reads as follows: "I could not look into your innocent eyes and tell you that the man you were aiding was a murderer. The future holds for me only one pleasant thought: a memory of your kindness. Forgive and forget."

A later scene shows the home of the acrobat. His wife is startled by a telegram which reads: "If John communicates with you, tell him to join show. Frank only stunned. Newspaper report exaggerated. His old position open." The acrobat silently destroys a simple trophy of the girl he met and goes to his wife's arms; while at the distant farm May is seen to respond to Joe's honest love and tosses the letter from her strange prince into the passing stream.

A CHILD'S INFLUENCE (Aug. 5).—Nelson, a hard-working young man, shares his room with Ralph Henly, who is his exact opposite. Nelson is employed as a stone cutter, working every day, while Henly, the laziest of men, lies in bed all day long, smoking cigarettes and reading newspapers. Nelson, who has diligently saved his money so as to purchase a home for himself and sweetheart, when they are married, draws his savings from the bank. This Henly discovers, and during Nelson's absence looks for and finds the money. He goes out, just as Nelson enters. Nelson discovers that his savings are missing and instantly starts out in search of Henly. His quest is unsuccessful and, unable to face his sweetheart in his impoverished condition, he gradually drifts away from her, and she sees him no more. A year passes, and Nelson, growing weaker and weaker through worriment and his unceasing search for Henly, loses his position. Henly, meanwhile, dressed always in the height of fashion through the aid of his stolen money, wins the heart and hand of an immensely wealthy widow. The widow and her young daughter look upon the handsome Henly as an ideal husband and father, and Henly and the widow are married. They lead a very happy existence, Mrs. Henly never suspecting her husband's black past. One day the child and her nurse go for an outing in the wood and the child wanders away alone. She finds, nearly dead from starvation, Nelson, who had stopped to rest from his weary wanderings and fruitless search for the man who had caused his misfortune and who he intended killing on sight. The child gives Nelson a sandwich and a bottle of milk and Nelson, refreshed, thanks the child for probably saving his life. The next day Henly and his wife are out in the park, driving their automobile, when Nelson catches sight of his arch-enemy. Upon seeing these unmistakable signs of wealth and happiness about Henly, and after ruminating over his own lot, Nelson jumps on the back of the machine, riding there until the couple arrive at home. Nelson bides his time and then enters the house. He finds Henly in the parlor and strangles him nearly to death. Henly's cries bring his wife and child to his rescue, and the child comes between the two men. Nelson recognizes the child as the one who had befriended him the day before and upon her statement and plea that he should not kill her father, Nelson, stricken with remorse at the thought that by carrying out his purpose he would make the child unhappy, relinquishes his hold on Henly's throat and slinks from the house, while Henly dismisses the incident by saying that the ragged stranger was probably a burglar, but thankful of the child's influence in saving his wretched life.

squaw. Lee shows her the picture in a locket of the girl for whom he is making a home. Mona understands and departs sorrowfully. Wade, the prospector, witnesses this scene and vows vengeance on Lee who has thwarted his desire for the beautiful Indian girl.

He goes to the Indian camp and tells Big Turtle that Lee has designs on Mona. Wade takes Big Turtle to a point overlooking Lee's cabin and shows him Mona and Lee in what appears from the distance to be a love scene. Big Turtle is furious and calls his tribe together and they plan to do away with Lee.

Lee and his sweetheart, Bessie, are quietly married in the meantime and Lee takes her to the little cabin in the clearing.

Later the Indians waylay Lee by lassoing him and dragging him from his horse. They then proceed to a nearby corral and steal a green hide, from which they cut a long strip and bind Lee, knowing that as the hide dries it will gradually strangle Lee.

Mona has watched the capture and preparation for the torture and after the Indians have taken their departure, she frees Lee. He in gratitude places the locket about Mona's neck. Wade, who has returned to gloat over his enemy, witnesses the act and vows vengeance on both.

Wade tells Big Turtle that his daughter has freed the captive, and when Mona returns to the Indian camp she is driven away. She seeks Lee's cabin and is taken in. Later Wade poisons Bessie's mind by telling her that Lee and Mona were lovers in the past, and to prove his assertion tells her of Lee giving Mona the locket, which was a gift from Bessie. Bessie finds the locket about Mona's neck, and in bitter jealousy runs away. She is lost and eventually makes her way to the Indian camp. There she is cared for by the squaws. Wade, who is following her, falls into a bear trap and dies.

Lee finding Bessie missing starts out in search of her. Mona, with Indian skill, trails the girl to the camp of Big Turtle. There husband and wife are reunited, and Big Turtle relents and takes Mona back into his home.

THE HONOR OF LADY BEAUMONT (Aug. 6).—Lady Beaumont was electrified. Gordon, returning from an inspection of his Canadian properties, assured her that he had seen her former suitor, Sir Dorian Mars in hiding there. She wanted him; must have him; but how? Her solicitor, when summoned, suggested that as business was taking him into Canada, he personally would deliver her message to Sir Dorian.

After a hard journey the solicitor found himself in the most primitive of huts, facing a stalwart Englishman, a pretty squaw, and a vivacious child. Sir Dorian, when assured that there was no danger awaiting him in England, admitted his identity. Lady Beaumont's summons to "home" swayed his senses like old wine. For a moment he wavered, his squaw and baby gazing at him questioningly; then he struck a powerful fist on the rude table and almost shouted "By God's grace, no! Listen, Todhunter, and see whether you'd respond in my place. Lady Barbara Beaumont, knowing my great love for her, played fast and loose with me from the time we were youth and maid. Her extravagance had her in hot water all the time. My funds were great. I placed them constantly at her disposal, which she accepted because of our expectation of marriage. Bridge was her complete undoing. She'd lose five hundred pounds at a sitting and think nothing of it.

"Barbara met a Captain Ferris, unscrupulous, scheming, irresistible, and came under his domination. To further some base plan, he placed Barbara under great obligations by discharging her growing gambling debts. She refused to dismiss me in his favor, and his plan had a new impetus. Barbara got into a very tight place financially and dared not appeal to me. He frightened her into tricking Christie, the pawnbroker. Under his tuition, she placed her tiara, on which Christie was to let her have ten thousand pounds, into one box and in the other box placed coal, black diamonds Ferris called them, with her seal. By a clever substitution, Christie got the black instead of the real diamonds. Ferris relieved Barbara of the surplus funds, placed them on Vanity in the Ascot races, and—every cent was lost. He intended forcing her into marriage with him by comprising her honor.

"At a ball given in her honor, Lady Beaumont wore the famous diamond tiara. Ferris had invited Christie. Christie blinked at the circlet of diamonds, bowed suavely to Lady Beaumont, and requested her presence at his office next day. She went, getting word to me first to be on hand as she might need a friend. Coached by Ferris, she proposed to give Christie a potion in water, exchanging the boxes while he was in stupor. Christie was old, her hand unsteady, result, the man sank into a deathlike coma. Barbara fleeing, encountered me and gave me the telltale box. To make my escape, I had to overpower an officer who attempted to trip me up at the landing where my motorboat was moored. The policeboat followed. It was only by a streak of luck that I was able to elude it. I fled here and was placed on the Royal M. P. Naturige, whom you see here, saved my life at the risk of her own, and nursed me to health when I was sorely wounded. I married her. This is our little 'papoose.' Out in the great world, in England, in London, all is vanity, vanity! But here Naturige knows no artifice. Her days are a litany, chanted to me, her deity. So I ask, Todhunter, would you in my place be foolish enough to go back?"

Lady Beaumont waited and waited. The peacocks on her lawn preened their iridescent plumes in the sun. Wearily she turned away, blinking brilliant, big tears from under hot-lidded eye. "Vanity, vanity! All is vanity."

THE HEART OF A HEATHEN (Aug. 8). Edward Alexander, unmarried and rich, makes his home with his mother and sister. The family upon detecting thievery in their home discharge the guilty servant and later decide to close their town house and go for a motoring trip in the West.

Old Woo, a peaceful Celestial, who by deprivation and honest toil has at last reached a state of small independence through the conducting of a little laundry in a Western border town, goes forth from his laundry—only to return later and find his small establishment in flames. Grief-stricken he sinks before the burning rooms in which are indeed all his hopes and ambitions.

Alexander, during his motoring trip, happens upon the scene of Old Woo's grief. The young man is moved by the appeal of the Celestial and plunges into the burning building, rescuing a sacred horn, very dear to the heart of the old heathen, owing to the superstition of the race. The simplicity of the Chinaman's gratitude appeals to Alexander and he offers him the position of servant in his home. Woo gladly accepts and goes with them.

On returning to the East, Alexander becomes engaged to Mary Charleson, a widow. Woo becomes attached to Mary's little daughter, Doris, but Mary conceives an intense dislike for Woo and finally tells Alexander that unless he discharges Woo she will never marry him. Woo leaves, heartbroken, and Mary and Alexander are married.

Meanwhile a Chinese Tong has decided to kidnap Doris and hold her for ransom. They do so and Mary and Alexander are heartbroken. Woo, however, is living in the house in which the Tong rooms are located and hears Doris crying in another room. Fearing for her, he breaks through the wall and rescues her but is himself captured by the Tong and taken before their leader. Doris is also again brought before the leader. Woo has recognized the Tong rooms and shows the sacred horn, causing all other members of the Tong to do his bidding. He is allowed to take Doris away with him and returns her to Mary, who then becomes grateful and asks Alexander to take him back into his service.

THE SNAKE (Two Reels) (Aug. 9).—A visit from Capt. Dan to Mona, at the Indian village, rouses the jealousy of the Snake, a snake priest. He attempts to kill Dan, but is foiled by Mona. Dan, leaving Mona after a love scene, returns to the Fort followed by Snake.

Snake, thinking it an easy matter to take the Fort, incites the Indians to the attack by means of the snake dance, showing the mode of catching the serpents, washing them, Indian magic, etc. The Captain and a friend while out riding are attracted by the dancers; but when they ride up to observe the dance the Snake and his Indians surround him. Mona again holds the tribe back, and then jumping on the horse behind Dan they ride back to the Fort pursued by Snake and a few Indians.

At the Fort a warm reception is prepared for the Indians, but Snake, perceiving their intention, professes friendship, which the Colonel accepts in spite of warnings.

Later, the Snake returns to the Fort, and while his men are firing it he runs off with Mona. Captain Dan, learning of it, follows and is lured into the desert to die by the wily Snake.

Snake makes Mona his prisoner. Dan comes into the village and sees the Snake threaten to throw Mona in the snake pit if she will not agree to come to him. Snake places Mona back in his lodge, and Dan goes into the lodge to try and help the girl away. Snake discovers Dan in the lodge and surrounds it with his men. When Mona and Dan come from the lodge, Dan is made prisoner and Mona escapes. She attempts to dig through the adobe wall of the Priest's lodge where Dan is held a prisoner, but is caught by Snake, who makes them both prisoners and begins to torture Dan. Dan offers to fight for Mona, and Snake accepts the challenge, but by a deadly means. He places a large snake on a blanket on the lodge floor and bares his arm to it, daring Dan to do the same.

The friend, who helped him on the desert, comes to the village with the cavalry, the Colonel looks through the village until he finds the strange duel going on. A sharpshooter is called, who shoots the snake between the duellists, but too late, for Snake has been bitten by the deadly serpent and lies dead, while Dan and Mona are released from their bonds.

ing chemist, are rivals for the hand of pretty May Martin, the daughter of the chemist.

The two men vie with one another for the favor of the girl and very discreetly she shows no favoritism.

Will resorts to unfair intrigue to disgrace Bob by robbing the safe and leaving a bit of evidence that will implicate Bob. The plot works very well until in his anxiety to gain supremacy Will unwittingly discloses evidence that would prove an alibi for Bob. May has never doubted the integrity of Bob and quickly appreciates the value of the evidence. But she is forcibly locked in the chemical laboratory at the Martin house. Her knowledge of chemistry enables her to prepare a charge of nitro-glycerine, with which she blows open the door.

The evidence, a photograph of Bob drinking at a pond, is taken to the court room, where Bob's trial is under way, and proves his innocence and the case is dismissed.

Will leaves for parts unknown and Bob and May prosper in their love for one another.

GOLDEN GATE PARK AND ENVIRONS.—California, the mecca for tourists the year round, encompasses a greater number of gorgeous natural beauties than any other like area throughout the world.

This series of picturesque gems was produced under the personal supervision of Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Mfg. Co., and comprises the most attractive and inspiring gems of nature that it has ever been the privilege of mortal eye to rest upon.

Specimens of animal and luxurious vegetable life predominate and furnish a satiating repast for the eye and mind to feast upon. California's great charms are recognized throughout the traveled world. Charms not merely of attraction but of persistence, and it is truthfully maintained that he who once comes within their influence usually returns.

San Francisco can be safely termed one of the most spectacular cities of the United States. This city is a veritable reservoir of dynamic energy that finds an outlet in the hale and hearty endeavor that predominates in civic, social and political activities.

The Golden Gate is such an historical phenomenon with its gateway a mile in width that the beauty of the spectacle at once impresses itself indelibly upon the mind of the observer.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (July 28).

CURIOUS SEA CREATURES (July 29).—There are millions of little creatures serving their particular functions in the scheme of things but which are unknown to those who have not made a special study of them. The floor of the sea is the home of a great variety of these creatures and this film serves to bring them to our attention in a very interesting manner. Among the fishes studied are the Sea Cucumber, a delicacy of the Chinese table, worth about 35 cents a pound, which is found off the Malay peninsula; the Hippocampus or Sea Horse, so called because of the remarkable resemblance it bears to a horse's head, and the Bonellia, which moves from place to place by the alternate inflation and deflation of its body.

On the same reel:

DAILY DOINGS IN MANILA.—This film will satisfy the desires of Americans to see just how well the natives of the Philippine Islands are progressing under the rule of the Stars and Stripes.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE (July 30).—On the night she is to be graduated from school little Violet Watts implores her father to accompany her, as she is afraid to pass a house which has long borne the reputation of being haunted. Jim Watts hesitates, because he knows that his enemy, Pete Brooks, is gunning for him, but finally Watts starts for the commencement with his daughter. As they pass the haunted house a noise within is heard. Jim decides to investigate. Pete Brooks has been following Jim stealthily and continues after him into the house. In one of the rooms Watts comes upon his mother talking to Brooks' father. Jim and Pete demand an explanation. The old folks declare that they are sweethearts and, in order to be friends, are forced to meet in the haunted house because of the feud between their sons. Their hearts touched by the pleas of the old lovers the two men agree to discontinue the warfare.

THE CALL OF THE BLOOD (July 31).—Thomas Gray arrives at a little Western town with a note from the governor of the state asking the sheriff to help the young man find his sister, who, when a child, went West with her father, and has not been heard from for twenty-five years. One of the cowboys, when consulted, says the girl has been brought up by the Indians and is now living at their camp. Tom identifies his sister by a slight scar. He offers to take her back East, but the girl's Indian lover orders her to stay. The girl is undecided, but when the Indian wounds her brother for attempting to take her away by force she hears, for the first time, the call of the blood, and answers.

The camera pays a visit to the home of the yellow-hammer, the hedge-sparrow, the woodcock, arriving here just at dinner time, the owl, where twin owlets are proudly on exhibition, the beautiful hen-pheasant and her young at play, the linnet and her brood waiting for father, and a kingfisher that proves his right to the name by displaying a large fish which he has caught.

On the same reel:

MONTE CARLO, MONACO.—Monte Carlo is unquestionably the most beautiful spot in Europe, and millions of persons journey from the four corners of the globe every year to see it. By means of this film the beautiful resort is brought before your eyes with all its charm.

The Pathe camera has taken the same route and, as a result, the verdant valley is transplanted to the screen. On both sides of the beautiful valley are lined enormous peaks (one of them, Half Dome, a mile and three-quarters high) and embracing waterfalls, Bridal Veil and Yosemite, the latter 2,600 feet high, Vernal and Nevada, spilling their sparkling streams into the turbulent little Merced River that winds its way like a silver thread through the Yosemite Valley.

On the same reel:

COLOMBO, CAPITAL OF THE ISLAND OF CEYLON.—A jinrikisha journey through this little town showing all the scenes of interest, which are indeed many.

BELOW THE DEAD LINE (July 28).—Mike Grogan, a crook, sends his daughter, Rose, to a fashionable reception with orders for her to ply her trade and get away with the guests' jewelry. Joe Emerson, a reporter on the Chronicle, is sent by the city editor to cover the affair and give it a big write-up. At the reception Mrs. Vandermade exhibits her new necklace and has trouble in getting it refastened. Rose offers her help, and when Mrs. Vandermade sits with her escort in the conservatory, Rose steals behind the palms and takes the insecurely fastened necklace without detection, except by Joe, who, standing out of sight, is taking notes for the paper. Joe confronts her before she has concealed the necklace and bars her escape. The necklace is missed and detectives are asked to search the guests, as all have made known their willingness. Seeing that Rose will be caught, Joe takes the necklace from her and returns it, the affair being dismissed. Rose hurries out, but Joe meets her and, escorting her home, secures her promise to reform. Rose tells Grogan of her decision, but Spike, her brother, overhears and attempts to strike her, but is prevented by Nelson, Grogan's partner, who is in love with Rose. Later, Joe finds her a boarding house and calls to escort her to it. They leave, but her suitcase is forgotten. Joe returns for it. Nelson has dissolved partnership with Grogan and, as he has been cheated, sneaks into the house and shoots him. Joe sees him dash out and, picking up the fallen revolver, the reporter hurries inside, only to find Grogan dead. An officer, hearing the shot, breaks in and, finding Joe beside the dead man and with the gun in his hand, arrests him. At the trial Joe is found guilty and sent to prison. He declares his love for Rose and asks her to wait for him. Rose decides to save Joe and, by a trick, secures Nelson's confession to the crime. Joe is released and the lovers are reunited.

THE HEAVENLY WIDOW (Aug. 6).—Billy and Angella are lovers. Billy introduces his friend Jack to Angella, and Angella falls in love with Jack and neglects Billy. To get even, Billy poses as a dashing widow at Jack's boarding house. Jack flirts with the fake widow and takes strolls in the park with her. Then Billy, the fake widow, sends a note to Angella, which reads:

"Jaek is deceiving you. If you want it proved, conceal yourself behind the big elm in the park immediately.

"A Friend."

Angella receives the note and goes to the park to spy on Jack. She gets behind the big elm and sees Jack and the widow on the bench making love. Jack tries to kiss the widow. Angella comes forward, denounces him and returns his ring. The fake widow gets tickled and starts snickering, which enrages Angella, and she starts a hair-pulling match with the widow. After she has mussed the widow up good she accidentally pulls her wig off and discovers Billy. Then she regrets the way she treated Billy, and she hints that Billy can take her back again, which he does.

FALSELY ACCUSED (Aug. 8).—Helen Walter, a rich and fickle girl, is in love with her cousin, Jack King. He does not in any way return her affection, being very fond of Miss Brown, the pretty little seamstress, who comes daily to the Walter home. Jack spends much time with Miss Brown, reading or talking to her while she sews. Helen notices the attention her cousin shows the seamstress, and is very jealous. She finally hits upon a plan whereby she can get Miss Brown out of the way.

Jack is proposing to the little seamstress when Alice enters the room with Miss Brown's coat, in which she says she found her jewels. Miss Brown denies the accusation, but Alice calls in the police and she is arrested. Jack is very much shocked at the occurrence, but feels sure that his sweetheart is innocent. He therefore goes to a detective and explains the matter to him. The detective takes him to a hypnotist who, by his hypnotic power, to which Alice is susceptible, makes her confess. Jack meets Miss Brown at the prison gate after she is released, and they lose no time in finding a minister.

THANHOUSER

LITTLE DORRIT (July 29).—Little Dorrit was born in the Marshalsea prison in London, where debtors were confined years ago. Her father had numerous creditors whose claims had to be satisfied before he could leave the prison's gloomy walls.

Her mother died when the child was eight years old, and the girl lived in the Marshalsea with her brother and sister. She was devoted to her family and helped them in many ways. Through her efforts a dancing master, temporarily imprisoned in the Marshalsea, instructed her sister Fanny in the art of dancing. A seamstress taught Little Dorrit how to sew, and the girl in her new occupation, earned money to buy luxuries for her helpless family.

Little Dorrit frequently did sewing for Mrs. Clennan, an elderly widow, and at her home met her son Arthur, who had just returned from a trip abroad. The young man was strongly attracted by the quiet, self-sacrificing girl, and a strong attachment sprang up between them, but little Dorrit was loyal to her family, who she felt were dependent upon her.

Arthur Clennan bent every effort to secure the release of Dorrit from Marshalsea, and succeeded in proving the latter's right to a fortune left by a distant relative. The Dorrits, now rich, ignored Arthur, to whom they owed everything; that is, all except Little Dorrit, but her family forced her to go with them to Italy and become a society personage like themselves.

Wealth did not bring happiness to the Dorrits. Little Dorrit was as unaffected as ever, but her family was purseproud and arrogant. The father was stricken at a banquet and died soon after, believing that he was once more a prisoner in the Marshalsea. Little Dorrit, now free, received word that Arthur Clennam had lost his fortune and was a prisoner himself in the Marshalsea. She went to him and comforted him in his hour of trial. Fortune smiled upon them, and Arthur soon was able to pay his debts and leave the Marshalsea forever with his bride, Little Dorrit, the child of the Marshalsea.

IN THE NICK OF TIME (Aug. 1).—It often happens that very loving wives are also very jealous of the objects of their affections, as many a married man has learned by bitter experience.

A young salesman in a dry goods house often heard this statement made, but laughed it to scorn. His wife was devoted to him and to their little daughter, and as far as jealousy was concerned, why, she was incapable of so base an impulse.

His opinion was put to the test. The head of his firm detailed him to entertain a lady buyer for an out-of-town concern. He took the customer to the theatre, and to dinner at a high-priced restaurant. His wife chanced to see him with the woman, at once arrived at the wrong conclusion, and WAS jealous. When the salesman arrived home there was a quarrel. The wife would listen to no explanations, the husband was hotheaded, and the result was that he took his belongings and left his home at once.

The wife was well provided for, and she had the companionship of her child. The husband had a comfortable boarding place. But they were both unhappy, for they really cared for each other, and pride alone prevented them from making up their differences. Then fate took a hand in the problem.

The wife called upon a neighbor in an adjoining flat, and during her absence her little daughter turned the valve in the gas log. The door leading to the flat snapped shut when the mother crossed the hall and she had forgotten her key. When she discovered her child's peril she called frantically for help, and the appeal was answered by her husband. Exerting all his strength he smashed the door from its hinges and rushed into the flat just in time to save his child's life. The child's peril proved to be a blessing in disguise, for it was the means of bringing the little family together again.

pass and Angela is grown to womanhood. The Consul has retired from public life and lives in New York. Angela thinks he is her father and she is engaged to a promising artist.

One day whilst walking in the Ghetto, Hooper sees Tempesta and persuades him to come to the studio and pose as a brigand for him.

Angela and the Consul visit the studio and Tempesta recognizes his daughter from her likeness to her sainted mother and also from his easy recognition of the Consul.

Angela and the artist stroll to the garden and Tempesta makes himself known to the Consul, who is shocked at again meeting the man he thought dead.

Tempesta desires to make himself known to his daughter, but the Consul alternately pleads and reasons with him and finally persuades him that he has nothing to give her—nothing to offer—neither position, place, nor money. Why disillusion her? Why crumble her dreams and ambitions, why interfere with the perfect love existing between the girl and her supposed father? Tempesta is touched—he agrees not to make himself known and, refusing financial assistance, he brushes away the tears that scorch his cheeks and goes sadly away.

GAUMONT

A HAIR-RAISING AFFAIR (July 29).—This is farce, farce, farce all along the line, and cannot be taken seriously for a single moment. Simple Simon is seen in this film undertaking the craziest of all the crazy things this resourceful comedian has ever been held responsible for.

We find Simon has set up as a pyrotechnic expert,; fireworks have become a profession with him, and his business has far-reaching ramifications, his fame extending even to the wild prairie lands of Mexico. His services are requested by the Senor Juan Olivette, whose address looks absolutely unpronounceable. Simon promptly cables an acceptance of the commission, and in the next scene we find him at Olivette's hacienda in Sao Paulo Bio, Mexico. His ludicrous adventures embrace flirting with the niece of Senor Juan Olivette, being chased by her irate fiance, undergoing the torture of scalping by the Oilyfeet Indians (who describe themselves as "Scalp Specialists and Hair Raisers"), being slung on a pole and slowly roasted and basted over a large fire, culminating in his giving a "free pyrotechnic display," in the course of which he entirely exterminates the noxious and cannibalistic Oilyfeet. An epilogue shows us Simple Simon and the beauteous Senorita Dolores as man and wife contemplating their very own tribe of "Tenderfeet," which they have themselves raised.

A RESOURCEFUL LOTHARIO (July 31).—Our "masher" friend, Gerald King, who imagines himself to be such a lady-killer, is a brisk little man, a keen admirer of feminine beauty, and somewhat irrepressible. Strolling around the stores section of the city he observes two pretty actresses discussing a stylish hat in the window of a millinery store. His attempts to enter into conversation, taken by the camera as it moves along with the party, are very amusing. Subsequently the two ladies separate, and Gerald follows the prettier one. Unaffected by her snubs he persists until she reaches home. He is told more than once that she is married, but even the servant fails to persuade him to go away, and sheer audacity finally brings him face to face with the lady. After such perseverance Gerald no doubt thinks he is entitled to a smile, but not a bit of it. A sudden step on the stair causes the lady's face to blanch with fear. Her husband has entered the flat, and she hastens to inform Gerald that he has a fiery temper. Our "masher" is somewhat disturbed at the prospect of a scene, but a ready wit comes to his rescue. Seizing a large pot of roses from a stand he dashes it to the ground, batters his silk hat and damages his coat. He decorates the hat with a couple of roses and twines a stem of them about his neck. When the husband appears he perceives an angry, flustered little man, who greets him thus: "Ah, there you are, sir! Do you know that one of your gol durned flower pots fell on my head just now, as I was passing under your window?" Apparently the husband doesn't, and hastens to pacify the victim as he begins to talk about damages. He offers his own coat and hat in exchange for Gerald's damaged articles. He is even persuaded by the threatening attitude of that practical joker to offer a fifty-dollar bill, which is grudgingly accepted. Gerald ultimately takes his leave in a hat and coat several sizes too large.

The next day a man arrives with a box containing the hat which had been so much admired by the two actresses when Gerald saw them looking into the milliner's window. It is accompanied by a card, on which our hero begs to present his excuses, and states that the hat has been paid for with her husband's cash.

On the same reel:

IN THE LAND OF DATES.—This film transports the spectator to one of the date palm districts of upper Egypt—the Oasis of Belad-el-Djerid. We are shown the date palms growing amid luxurious tropical surroundings. The method of gathering the fruit by natives situated in relays all down the trunk of the tree is quite instructive. The top man hooks off a bunch of dates and hands it down to the next man, he swiftly passes it on to a third man, and so it travels rapidly earthward until, reaching the ground, it is handed to a "runner," who conveys it to the packing department. The dates are packed on the spot and shipped away in cars from the Oasis.

LOYAL HEARTS (July 31).—Nell Canby, a young Western girl, with a fondness for painting, has an inseparable companion in her horse, Bob. Engrossed in her art, Nell dreams of going to New York in order to further her studies. At this junction, a young ranchman falls in love with her, and she promises to become his wife on the condition that she first completes her education in the big city. Her father objects to her going, but his old partner persuades him to let the girl go. Nell takes her horse with her to New York, and is progressing finely with her studies. The young ranchman starts on a long trip with a herd of cattle, and in the meantime, Nell's father is taken ill and dies. Owing to unfortunate speculations he has lost all, and Nell, in New York, hears the sad news of her bereavement and unfortunate financial condition. She bravely makes up her mind to support herself by her art, and economizes by securing cheaper lodgings. She is unable to pay for her horse's keep, and the liveryman threatens to sell Bob. Nell tries to dispose of some of her paintings in order to pay her bills, but finds no market. The liveryman sells her horse to a junkman, and Bob is badly treated.

The young ranchman has returned from his long trip and starts for New York in search of his sweetheart. He comes across Bob being ill treated by the junkman, and recognizes the horse. He has endeavored to trace Nell, but without avail. He buys the horse, cares for him, and Bob again becomes the horse he was in the days Nell petted him. While riding along Riverside Drive he meets Nell in a forlorn condition. The sweethearts, with their pet, return to the West.

Miss Bessie Bannon, Horace G. Plimpton's charming and thoroughly business-like private secretary, has sailed for a six weeks' trip to Europe. Every caller at the Edison Studio will remember this tactful lady whose ability to guard Mr. Plimpton from the casual visitor—and many others—is a matter of classic history. Hers is a well earned vacation and we join in wishing Miss Bannon "the time of her life."

Ben Wilson has been doing capital work opposite Mary Fuller in several recent Edison releases, notably "The Robbers" and "The Romance of Rowena." We also find this talented actor playing the hero in the first of the new "Mary" stories. Mr. Wilson is another devotee of the midnight gasolene and spends all his spare time in his benzine buggy.

* * * *

Charles Sutton, who has played important parts in Edison films for several years, does a powerful piece of character work as the hunchback in "The Rightful Heir." As a member of the Edison Western Company last winter Mr. Sutton took advantage of many excellent opportunities to display his talent as a dramatic actor.

* * * *

Frank McGlynn, late of the Chicago production of "Officer 666," made his return to Edison films felt at once by the power of his acting. Mr. McGlynn's work has that gripping realism which holds an audience every second that he is on the screen.

Kansas City, Mo.—A building permit for a theatre building at 3042 Highland avenue was issued to W. B. C. Brown. Cost, $20,000.

"FLYING A" SIDELIGHTS

A Two-Minute Chat with Warren Kerrigan, Handsome Leading Man of the "Flying A" Company

The question has been put to me, "What do you consider your greatest achievement?" and to answer it is by no means an easy task.

Frankly, there are several things that I could mention, but the one achievement I feel most grateful for is the manifest appreciation that is shown in the many letters that I receive each day from unknown and unseen friends in which they tell me of the enjoyment they get from seeing my different portrayals upon the screen. I want to be appreciated, for I actually experience the emotions I am called upon to portray in the pictureplays each day.

I live in my work, for my work and for my mother, whom I prize as the dearest possession I have upon this earth. She is ever my source of inspiration and without her sympathetic co-operation, my work would be almost in vain. I aim to follow her gentle advice in the purity of touch, wholesome manliness and clean gestures in my work.

I am always deeply gratified to receive letters from mothers who tell me of "how their sons have tried to copy my ways in helping those in need and in being kind to all."

My mother is my "silent partner." I want the whole world to know it, and if I am the "source of inspiration" to others, I will not have lived in vain; and I consider this my greatest achievement.

Mr. Kerrigan now maintains a trophy room, a place he has set aside for the gifts that he receives from admirers from all over the civilized world. He is the recipient of all kinds of rare and beautiful gifts, paintings, needlework, souvenirs from foreign countries, jewelry of rare and unique design, in fact, everything that could occur to a widely diversified number of people as to what would be most pleasing to their hero. And now with all these articles to beautify a home Mr. Kerrigan is planning a very artistic and cozy bungalow not far from the "Flying A" studio. Jack hopes to have it completed late this fall, where in a home of his own with his mother he will be supremely content.

Although Miss Rich, leading lady of one of the "Flying A" stock companies, was not raised on a farm, she is fond of all kinds of domestic animals. Last Sunday with a party of friends Miss Rich took a drive into the country, and as the day was extremely warm they stopped at a ranch house to quench their thirst. The ranch owner is a picture enthusiast and, recognizing Miss Rich, showed them every courtesy and took them around his place. Miss Rich was particularly attracted to a number of pigs which she described as "too cunning." The rancher immediately presented her with one of the little porkers. All went well until about a mile from Santa Barbara, when the pig got unruly and with one final squeal he hopped from her restraining grasp and hurried ranchward with Miss Rich in full chase. It is regretted that the camera man with his apparatus was not along, for the public would then have had a glimpse of Miss Rich in a decidedly new role. Nobody dares to say pigs to Miss Rich around the studio.

Mr. Heimerl, one of the camera men for the American Film Mfg. Co., usually has the misfortune of getting into the most difficult situations, but is always cool headed in the face of danger. A short time ago he figured in an explosion, said to be the nearest a camera was ever gotten to a blast, and while photographing the dash of a posse after a fugitive in "The Flirt and the Bandit," release date soon to be announced, he was almost run down by a fractious horse that made for the camera and reared up over it beyond the control of the rider. With characteristic coolness Heimerl grabbed his camera and stepped quickly aside just as the horse came down on the spot he had vacated. When it was all over Heimerl was the coolest man present. "Was that close enough Mr. Ricketts?" he asked. Mr. Ricketts very thoughtfully replied: "Too close! Take it over. Go to it, Al!"

Mr. Edwin plans to do a big seacoast story, several tales of the North Woods, a "Mary" picture, and other interesting films. The party will be absent from the studio for six or eight weeks.

The Edison Studio, which only a few years ago was hailed as the biggest and best equipped moving picture studio, has already been outgrown by the Edison Company. A large addition is now being made to the front of the present building which will provide a large area of much needed stage room.

C. L. Chester, who produced some remarkable scenic films in South America for the Edison Company about two years ago, has been re-engaged by that company to make an extensive trip through the Northwest. Mr. Chester will travel through the beautiful Great Lakes, taking some interesting views of the famous "Soo" canal at Sault Ste. Marie, on his way to Duluth, where the greatest iron ore docks in the world are located. From there he goes to the Glacier National Park where he will be accompanied by twelve Indians in native costume who will lend realism to his pictures of this wild region. Mr. Chester will then swing out to the Coast, filming various scenes and spots of national fame. His wonderful success in South America forecasts some very interesting pictures from Mr. Chester's latest expedition.

Edison's version of the "Pied Piper of Hamlin" shortly to be announced, is one of the biggest spectacles that has been produced. For this film a village was actually constructed and four hundred people were used in the great scene for which the set was used. Herbert Prior, as the Piper, does a perfect bit of character work.

One of the most conspicuous absentees from the Edison booth at the Moving Picture Exposition was Robert Brower. Mr. Brower had just spent three days fishing at Barnegat and had been so badly sunburned that his lower lip was swollen as if from poisoning. The actor remarked with a rather gingerly smile that he had not dared to go to the Exposition for fear of being arrested for blocking the aisles.

From England come interesting letters telling of the experience of Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott. The fisherfolk of Devon and Cornwall have been furnished several exciting moments by these two players, not the least of which occurred when they were caught by the famous tides at the foot of the Ball Point Lighthouse and received a thorough ducking before they could escape to a safe place above the oncoming water.

On another occasion the whole fleet of fishing smacks was hired and several scenes were taken three miles out at sea. Then the wrecked German ship Alma was found slowly being battered to pieces by giant waves and the camera man, Otto Brautigan, insisted upon being put aboard. The natives lined the shore expecting to see him and his camera washed overboard, but he succeeded in getting the pictures he was after, though drenched to the skin.

Mary Fuller, who was the center of an admiring throng during the entire Edison night at the Moving Picture Exposition was deeply touched by the interest and admiration which was apparent in every face. "Though I was always fond of my 'dear public,'" she said, "I never realized until that night how really personal is their interest in me. These people whom I had never seen before knew me and loved me as a dear friend. It was an inspiration to me and left an impression which I shall never forget."

Milwaukee, Wis.—Chas. Petri, Kinnickinnic avenue near Potter avenue, moving picture house. Cost $8,500.

Mankato, Minn.—The American Amusement Company will erect a new theatre here. J. B. Nelson Construction Co. has contract, at $45,000.

VITAGRAPH NOTES

Miss Mary Charleson, of the Vitagraph Players, has recently come East from the Western studios and is now at the Vitagraph Studios in Brooklyn. She is staying with her aunt, Miss Kate Price, at her home at Brighton Beach. Miss Charleson will be seen soon in a two-part feature, "The Intruder," the first play in which she has taken part since leaving the West.

A prominent figure on Brighton Beach, Coney Island, is Miss Lillian Walker, of the Vitagraph Players. Miss Walker is an unusually clever swimmer and it is a great pleasure to watch the masterly manner in which she breasts a heavy surf.

Almost every Sunday is spent by Ralph Ince, of the Vitagraph Players, at his new country home at Brightwaters, Long Island, where he indulges in boating and fishing. Mr. Ince has just bought a new Oakland touring car and is thinking seriously of purchasing a racing motorboat.

The actors at the Vitagraph Studios are kept busy "kidding" Frank Mason about his band at Jamaica, Long Island, where he has organized a group of musicians and installed himself as their leader. It is almost dangerous to whistle "Alexander's Rag Time Band" while he is within hearing.

Wilfrid North, the well-known Vitagraph director, is a golf enthusiast of the most pronounced type. He was recently playing at Lenox, Mass., where he gave a splendid demonstration of difficult points in the game. He is a frequent visitor to Dunwoodie, New York, and is the holder of three golf cups given by the Dunwoodie Golf Club.

Charles Chapman, the scenic expert at the Vitagraph Studios, has just completed his new bungalow at Rockaway Point, Long Island, where he cuts a great figure among the residents. Last year he was elected "mayor" of the Point and it seems likely that he will receive the same honor this season.

Miss Ada Gifford, one of the latest additions to the Vitagraph stock company, is a well-known favorite in many stage productions. She joined the Vitagraph Players six weeks ago and already her personality has ingratiated itself upon the screen in a very marked way.

KINEMACOLOR ADOPTS SIMPLEX

Heretofore Kinemacolor projectors have all been manufactured in England, but owing to the impossibility of importing them rapidly enough to meet the demand, it was decided to make them in America. However, the trade could not wait for the building of a factory and the installation of machinery. At this juncture the Precision Machine Co. proposed to manufacture a projector for Kinemacolor, including all the latest improvements, such as the color reversal attachment, invented by Mr. Darby, of the New York office. The proposition was agreeable, and just before going abroad General Manager William H. Hickey placed an order for 100 machines.

Exhaustive tests prove that Simplex projectors fill all of the requirement for Kinemacolor projection. When run at normal speed thirty-two pictures are projected every second as compared with sixteen pictures per second of the ordinary kind. This double strain, wear and tear is successfully withstood by Simplex. Another wonderful achievement is the fact that Kinemacolor pictures can now be successfully projected with 35 amperes D. C., whereas 70 amperes D. C. were formerly required.

ERRATUM

In my report of the convention I stated that the Universal crowd was photographed at the Eclair studios, the negative developed and positive made by Eddie Roskam and shown on the screen at 8:30 the same evening. The information given me gave me to understand that Eddie Roskam had done this work in record time. I find I am in error in this and that Eddie Roskam DID NOT develop the negative or print the positives. This was done by the Eclair staff at the Eclair studio, and hurried to the Palisades by them and exhibited at the time stated in the dancing pavilion. A. H. S.

Laura Sawyer's clever dramatic work has again been brought out in the detective stories in which she is playing the leading part. Her performances are invariably forceful and she shows remarkable powers of repression in scenes which less capable players would spoil by over acting.

OPERATORS' CHAT

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—J. A. LeRoy.
Telephone—Stuyvesant 619
Office—133 Third Avenue.

We stated in the last Chat that the return of our delegates from the Twenty-first Annual Convention of the I. A. T. S. E. at Seattle, Wash., would be quite an event, and so it surely was. When the Chicago express pulled in at the Jersey City terminal with our president, Robert Goldblatt, on board, who so valiantly supported the cause of the M. P. Operators during the last five years, the greeting he received from the Reception Committee was such that he will not be likely to forget for many a day. The committee made things lively, and among the several events arranged was a group photograph with Brother Goldblatt as a central figure wearing "the smile that won't come off." In fact, not smiles alone showed in the photo, but many most pleased expressions on various members of the committee's faces depicted the happy frame of mind of all concerned. After the "picture thing" the entire "bunch" had a dinner to celebrate the occasion of the return of our president, Robert Goldblatt.

THE I. A. T. S. E. CONVENTION SERIES

As Seen by Our Baseball Reporter

From the Seattle Union Record.

TUESDAY'S GAME.

Shay pitching against whole team.
Wood gets to first on fluke hit.
Taylor, of American Federation of Labor, goes to first on four balls.
Spencer, batting for Shay, hits long drive, clearing bases.
Skinner fouls off several times and then struck out.
Higgins singles through short.
Shay's batting average—5 times up, 5 hits. Average, 1,000.

WEDNESDAY MORNING GAME.

Shay's speed is now blinding.
Lemke hits for two bases to deep left.
Richardson tries to come back in game, but again ordered to bench, and then is put off grounds.
Ground rules are now in effect as the game is getting warm, and the crowd is now going into the field.
Reynolds singles and is then caught napping off of first. Pitcher Shay says he is out of order.
McGrath is on coaching line, and has them up in the air.
Game called to allow Hart to get some more balls.
Crickmore now in box, as they claim Shay was not throwing the ball. His speed was blinding, and they could not see it. Barry hits long drive, and Shay makes great catch.
Higgins then hits long drive, and loses the ball.
Game called. The features of the game were the pitching of Shay and batting of Higgins.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON GAME.

Shay's speed is terrific; the crowd is wondering if he will last; his spitter is working and his control is wonderful. So far ten men have been sent back to the bench by the air route.
There is a lot of his hitters absent, but it doesn't make any difference to him. They have tried to work two balls on him, but he pitches them over as fast as they throw 'em to him.
Williams was up three times, got three hits. Ryan swings at three wide ones—out. Skinner fouls off several balls, and then strikes out.
Kelly fouls over grand stand.
Carroll gets to first on error, and then steals second and third.

THURSDAY MORNING GAME.

Shay on mound and getting better all the time.
Ryan at bat and still fouling off good strikes.
Simmons and Higgins throw several balls to catch Ryan napping.
Quinn goes into box, so Shay can bat. Shay bats one at Ryan, who gets out of the way of it.
O'Donnell then hits one at Ryan and it cripples him.
Shay strikes Cassidy and Monroe out; 6 balls pitched.
Crickmore goes into box.
Shay strikes out Carroll with spiral curve.
Carroll drives a hard one at Kelly.
Pitcher Crickmore, while in box, had great control.
Quinn hits to left field for two bases.
Sheck in box, just warmin' up.
Shay's pitching was marvelous. As fast as they came up they were sent back to the bench.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON'S GAME.

Shay is now in box, and has his fadeaway working perfectly.
The managers have brought their heavy batters into the game to try and break it up.
Crowds have great interest in game now. The betting is 2 to 1 that they don't score.
Batting order: Bird begs the pitcher to let him hit the ball; Cort refuses to go to the bat; Sherman pleads for his base, on balls, by trying to bull the team; Cluster pop fly to pitcher and out.
Rest of team refuse to play, as they are afraid to get hit, with Shay's speed.
Reynolds' grounder to third and out at first.
Kelly singles through short.
Weber drives the ball over the center field fence for a home run, with bases full.
The crowd cheered and threw their hats in the air.

THURSDAY EVENING'S GAME.

Crickmore in box; has lots of steam.
Ryan, after standing at the plate for two hours, hits a hard drive to O'Donnell, who, so far, has fielded it in major league style.
They are holding Pitcher Shay for the heavy hitters of the Managers' Association.
Shay, batting for O'Donnell, hits to deep left, for three bases, with the bases full.
Weather threatening.

THE NEUTRALIZATION CLUB.

Sir: Why not start the Playing-Both-Ends-Against-the-Middle Club? A man in New York who advertised "Special Regular 35c Dinner" will do for a charter member. J. B. N.

Above sounds to me as if some one took a trip up "Salt River."

The last meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 on Monday, July 21, witnessed a monster gathering of operators who are members of this organization, and during the proceedings of the meeting the report of the delegate to the I. A. T. S. E. Convention was greeted with tumultuous cheers. The attendance was over 450 members. Regular routine of business was quickly disposed of. Twenty-five new members took the obligation and 14 new applications for membership were presented to the body and will take their regular course.
The books were closed against any further applicants for membership at 3 a. m. and will remain closed until further notice.
The meeting closed at 4 a. m.

RELIANCE STUDIO HAPPENINGS

Work on the open air stage of the new studio is progressing so rapidly that at least one company will be producing pictures there by August 1st. Eddie Schulter is dividing his time between the uptown and downtown plants while Rosemary Theby, Edgena de Lespine and a number of other members of the regular stock company are preparing to live in the beautiful neighborhood of Riverdale-on-the-Hudson where they will be near the scene of their labors.

The well-known author, James Oppenheim, has written a scenario which will be released as a two-reel feature on August 9th, under the title of "The Fight for Right." Rosemary Theby and Irving Cummings will be starred jointly in this drama which deals with the Labor Union's side of the Prison Labor controversy and Prison Reform. Oscar C. Apfel is responsible for the staging of this timely story.

Among the newly acquired Reliance players are Norma Phillips and Irene Hunt. Miss Phillips is seen to advantage in "Below the Dead Line," while Miss Hunt appears in the leading role of "Kentucky Foes."

Edgena de Lespine has discovered a fad which is rather out of the ordinary for leading ladies. Edgena is raising fancy ducks at her summer home on Long Island and can talk about breeds of ducks little thought of by the faithful followers of the famous canvasback.

Six Multiples Now—And More Coming!

"The Flight of the Crow"

Selig—Two Reels August 11th

A ne'er-do-well becomes a tramp and his father cuts him off from a million dollar fortune. Relenting, his father seeks to find his son in the hope that he'll marry his adopted daughter.

The unselfish devotion of the girl's lover foils a treacherous lawyer and brings out a wonderful climax.

"The Mung Fu Tong"

Kleine-Eclipse—Two Reels Aug. 12th

The cashier of the bank is murdered. Detective Arizona Bill is called. A shot at a cobra, the retreat of two Chinamen, a wild motor ride, Bill's capture by a gang of Chinamen, and the appearance of his wife, whose nerve frees them both—here's a real thriller.

This week a new schedule of multiple reel releases goes into effect. Hereafter the manufacturers of multiple reel films will each be allotted a regular release day. On that particular day the regular single reel release of that company will be omitted.

Six companies are now ready to carry out this schedule. So for the week of August 11th, there will be six releases, running from Monday to Saturday.

Think of it! A new multiple feature for every day!

But that isn't all. For the week of August 18th, and until further notice, there will be eight multiple features.

Nothing like this service has ever been approached.

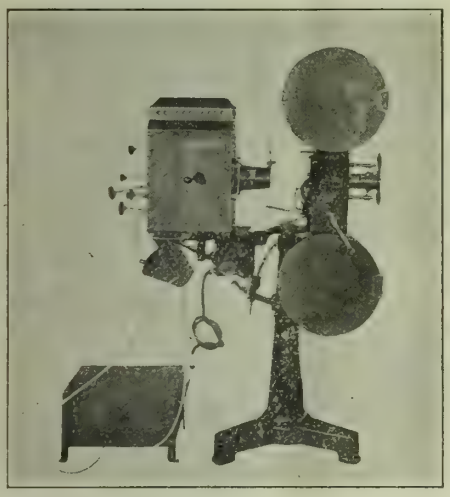
STERLING AND SIMPLEX

The word "STERLING" marked on a piece of silverware carries with it the idea of quality. All it really means is that the silver of which the article is made is of the finest.

Did you ever stop to consider that the design or the workmanship might be crude?

In this event the word "STERLING" while guaranteeing the quality of the material would not furnish much protection as to the true value of the aricle.

"STERLING" then is but a guarantee of material.



The word "SIMPLEX" marked on a projector means far more than a guarantee of the materials from which it is made.

It means, first, that the PROJECTOR is mechanically accurate—that in the course of manufacture it is graduated by the most perfect methods to 1/10,000 of an inch.

It means that the SIMPLEX projector was designed by the PRECISION MACHINE CO. to fill some definite important task—that of projecting a perfect picture, and in the opinion of the trade all over the world, that object has been achieved.

The word SIMPLEX on a projector is accepted the world over as a guarantee not only of perfect projection, but also excellence of materials and mechanical perfection.

Catalogue B fully describes it.

EX-CATHEDRA

VALEDICTORY

OFTENTIMES, in the affairs of men and nations, there comes a pause, and looking down the vista two roads appear; one to the right, the other to the left; both roads seem to lead to vast possibilities, and while it is not exactly a matter of chance, which road is taken, at the same time, the intuition of the individual, or the nation, pausing, has a great deal to do with the ultimate success or failure of the path chosen.

Sometimes after a long journey down the chosen path there comes again a forked road, and again, as sometimes at the turning point of life, or policy, we are again given pause. So it has been with myself. I voluntarily chose the path and have nothing to regret in all the long vista of looking backward. Again, I was confronted with two paths. Again I have chosen, and in this valedictory editorial I wish to bid au revoir to my numberless readers and friends. In resigning from the position as President of the Cinematograph Publishing Company and the editorial chair of the Moving Picture News I do so in the full confidence that I have done all that one man possibly could do to aid the successful advancement of the beautiful art of Cinematography. The sphere of my endeavors has been limited, at the same time it has drawn to me friends of the right kind.

Many times have I been offered positions, shares and stock, in companies exploited, or about to be exploited, which I have refused. In past editorials I have upheld the right of the educational film, and believing in its vast possibilities, with the fringe of the industry only just touched, and with the vast possibilities of this field before me, I am hoping to take some little part in the shaping of the future destinies of the educational film, for the purpose of educating the students of the universities, colleges, and the schools of our land. I am taking a little rest prior to associating myself with the work, and in passing from this chair into the throes of the commercial world I want to thank, first of all, those advertisers who have stood so loyally by my side throughout all my difficulties on behalf of the cause of right and justness. I want to thank the workers who have so ably assisted me on the staff of the News. First and foremost, my good friend William Lord Wright, who has been a trenchant aid in making the News popular. Miss MacDonald, who was with me for so long a period, to her also I tender thanks for the admirable manner in which she looked after the films for criticisms. To Miss Virginia West, for the admirable stories that she wrote and which helped to make the News a household paper, and an aid to the many exhibitors who used these stories as an introduction to the various films to which they so cleverly gave words.

Willard Howe, our Washington correspondent, also merits thanks for her untiring zeal in looking after the Washington people, and a word of commendation is also due to Horace Vinton (Mahoney), and others who have from time to time sent in contributions are thought of with gratitude. I also wish to thank my lieutenant, William M. Petingale, for the admirable manner in which he supported my efforts in the business end of the paper, and to all those whose letters have been to me an inspiration in the work that I undertook. Bidding these "au revoir" I wish for them the greatest possibilities in the future that they may command.

I want also to bespeak on behalf of the successors in this chair, the earnest support of the industry in all its branches, and that the same support that was so loyally given to me, may be augmented in the highest degree for the prosperity of the News which I had so much at heart.

In conclusion, if by my truthful statement of facts as they appeared to me, I made enemies (and what man in an editorial chair does not make enemies), I pray their forgiveness, and ask them, figuratively, to smoke the pipe of peace with me and in the future let us work for the advancement of that which we all have so much at heart—the highest, best, and the most beautiful in Cinematography for the education of the future citizens of the world.

Alfred H. Saunders.

All communications for Alfred H. Saunders personally may be addressed to him at 511 West 130th Street, New York.

ALL STAR FEATURE CORPORATION

Augustus Thomas Directing Film Production of "Arizona"—His Views on the Development of the Photo-Play—Harry R. Raver Outlines Plans of the Corporation

WHEN Augustus Thomas, America's foremost dramatist, decides to enter the moving picture field, it's about time for other dramatists to get aboard. Those who run may read and read the answer in the stars, at that.

Mr. Thomas has become identified with the All-Star Feature Corporation as director-general of productions. The executive offices of the corporation are at 220 West Forty-second street, New York. The officers are: Harry R. Raver, president; Archibald Selwyn, vice-president; George J. Cooke, secretary, and Philip Klein, treasurer. Mr. Raver is the representative of the Itala Company, and was formerly the manager of the Film Supply Company. He is one of the best known and most popular film men in the business, and his association with camera production dates back to 1901, when he became an exhibitor. Then in succession he was secretary and treasurer of the Association of Film Manufacturers; director of the Motion Picture, Distributing and Sales

AUGUSTUS THOMAS

Company; general manager of the American Eclair Company; secretary and manager of the Film Supply Company, and he now holds the position of secretary and manager of the Itala Company.

Mr. Selwyn is well known throughout the country as a theatrical producer connected with the American Play Company. Mr. Cooke is the head of the Metro Lithograph Company, and Mr. Klein is the son of Charles Klein, the well known dramatist.

The representative of the Moving Picture News hunted up Mr. Raver at his office in the Candler Building last Thursday to obtain a general outline of the new corporation's plans.

"We are devoting all our energies at present," said Mr. Raver, "to the forthcoming production of 'Arizona,' which may take place in September and may not take place until December. We are not bound by any contract and, therefore, can fix the date of releases to suit ourselves. Mr. Thomas has fully determined not to consent to the moving picture production of 'Arizona' until it has been made as perfect as possible. The scenic effects will abound in atmosphere. The Canby ranch, for instance, is actually being built on Staten Island. We have 175 acres there for that purpose. Everything is being done to reproduce the typical Arizona atmosphere.

"Mr. Farnum, who went to Egypt for the Kalem Company, is in charge of the construction work of exterior settings. He has reproduced Fort Grand from the ground up. No stage in the country could give the scenic realism to 'Arizona' such as will be presented in the film production. We have also made every effort to preserve the 'atmosphere' of the period in every other respect. The plot, as you know, is laid in Arizona about fifteen or sixteen years ago. The costumes were specially made by the Russell Uniform Company. Every actor who has a military part in 'Arizona' was sent to Russell's to be measured and fitted for a uniform suitable to the period. Of course, we had to subject some of these uniforms to rough usage in order not to have the soldiers appear as if they were rigged up for a dress parade. That reminds me of an experience of Henry Irving, who was a great stage manager as well as a great actor. He was producing a version of 'Faust.' At the dress rehearsal, when the soldiers marched on after their return from the war he nearly threw a fit. Their costumes were brand new without a crease or wrinkle or a speck of dirt. Thereupon Mr. Irving proceeded to pull out his pocket knife, and, regardless of expense, began to slash the gorgeous uniforms and directed a stagehand to smear dirt over them until the military supers looked like a lot of disreputable tramps. After the expensive uniforms had been ruined to his entire satisfaction Mr. Irving exclaimed: 'Now gentlemen, you look something like real soldiers who've been in battle, and not like a company on dress parade.'"

Mr. Raver said that Cyril Scott had consented to play the part of Denton and that the rest of the film cast is mostly made up of original "Arizona" players. "The rights to present the play in moving pictures," he added, "have already been sold to Great Britain, South Africa, Australia, India and Germany for one year. There are 260 scenes, and 250 people appear in the course of these scenes. There will be any number of soldiers mounted on horses and many others on foot.

"The play to follow 'Arizona' has not been decided on, but the All Star Feature Corporation have in view such popular plays as 'The Traveling Salesman,' 'In Missouri,' 'The Chorus Lady,' 'Colorado,' 'Alabama,' 'Within the Law,' 'The Girl in the Taxi,' 'The Witching Hour,' 'Pierre of the Plains,' 'The Light Eternal,' 'The Jungle,' 'Checkers,' 'D'Arcy of the Guards,' 'The Wolf,' 'The Country Boy,' 'Paid in Full,' 'The Earl of Pawtucket,' 'The Sporting Duchess' and 'The Arab.'"

At this point Mr. Thomas returned from lunch and the Moving Picture News representative proceeded to fire a few questions at him.

"Now," said Mr. Thomas, "don't ask me to talk about myself. Stick to the production. You know the Frenchman's definition of a bore. 'A bore is a man who talks to you about himself when you want to talk to him about yourself.' So please don't fill the interview with the first personal pronoun. Let's confine ourselves to anything 'appertaining to and touching on' moving pictures, as an illustrious ex-chief of police might put it."

"Well, then, what induced you to endorse moving picture productions?"

"Because I was convinced of the dramatic possibilities of the picture-play. The so-called chase pictures were a sort of kindergarten effort to sustain interest utterly devoid of anything akin to dramatic art. Then real actors were called into service by the film manufacturers and theatregoers became interested. Then came the feature films in which nearly all the actors are graduates of the regular stage. Now that the public demand real actors and multiple reel features I have become intensely interested, as I believe there are great possibilities in this line of work."

"Do you anticipate any great improvement in the art of camera production?"

"There will, undoubtedly, be great improvements, but, as in every other art development, it will be the result of experience and evolution, unless some genius like Edison startles the world with some great mechanical invention hitherto unknown. The modern dramatist, in writing a play for the speaking stage, no longer indulges in explanatory 'asides' to explain to the public as to what the character has in his mind's eye. The pictureplaywright is still compelled to resort to subtitles. This, in a measure, is being overcome by the methods of double exposure and dissolving views. These views, so to speak, melt into the scene. Take the case of a man under the stress of temptation, who is about to succumb to the wiles of an intriguing adventuress. He is gradually succumbing to the spell of her fascination, when the vision of another woman, a pure woman, is thrown upon the screen. He resists temptation, repulses the advances of the adventuress, and the public know what has prompted him to do this without the necessity of a subtitle.

"Again take the occasional soliloquy that the regular stage dramatist still makes use of to explain the thoughts of his characters. The pictureplay dramatist, by the dissolving view method, brings about the visualization of a soliloquy, which is much more artistic. You know, obtruding, dominant thoughts of the characters must be conveyed at times for dramatic effect."

"Do you believe that the speaking drama will be or has been seriously affected by the popularity of moving picture plays?"

"That depends! The performance of plays by elementary stock companies has been affected, of course. These performances no longer appeal to the public when moving picture theatres are running all over the country. The public would rather see good actors in the silent drama than poor actors in noisy melodrama. In fact, the pictureplays are making theatregoers. Indeed, they will make dramatists write better plays for the speaking stage. There is no better practice for budding dramatists than to write out a play so that it can be acted in pantomime. They will learn to discard unnecessary dialogue which proves the downfall of so many plays. It requires concentration on the part of an audience to follow a pictureplay. The eye alone, and not both eye and ear are appealed to. The 'talking' pictures have made an attempt to appeal to the ear also, but not very successfully. Until that has been accomplished I believe there will always be specialized audiences. The regular stage is bound to continue in great favor, but moving pictures will also appeal to vast audiences, especially with the improvements that are bound to come sooner or later."

"But you haven't said a word about the film production of 'Arizona.'"

"So far as 'Arizona' is concerned it has one great advantage. It has been played so extensively that a large portion of the theatre-going public are familiar with the plot. That, in itself, makes it possible to avoid subtitles to a large extent. But the fact that the play is full of action, made its adaptation for moving pictures comparatively easy.

"Arizona" will be just as attractive, I think, in moving pictures as it was on the speaking stage. Furthermore, it will be much more attractive in its scenic features, and will be accessible to all kinds of theatregoers."

GERTRUDE COGHLAN JOINS SELIG

Announcement comes from the executive offices of the Selig Polyscope Co., that Miss Gertrude Coghlan, the famous American actress, will become a regular member of the Selig organization next month. She will, for the present, be located at the Chicago studios of the company, and will make her first picture appearance in a series of plays specially written to suit her personality. Miss Coghlan is famous for her beauty and emotional ability, and should prove one of the strongest drawing-cards in the motion picture world. Miss Coghlan's career upon the legitimate stage has been marked with exceptional success and several times she has starred on Broadway. Among her more recent successes, might be noted the leading role, in "Alice of Old Vincennes," the part of Clara Hunter in "The Climbers," and the all-star revival of Bronson Howard's comedy, "One of Our Girls." Miss Coghlan's greatest success was undoubtedly made in the part of Shirley Rossmore in "The Lion and the Mouse." Following upon this hit, she appeared in "The Royal Box" and "The Traveling Salesman" with Frank McIntyre. The addition of Miss Coghlan to the acting forces of the Selig organization, is a step well in keeping with the progressive policies of this foremost institution.

MISS ETHEL GRANDIN

On the front cover we present a very good likeness of Ethel Grandin, the little leading lady of the Imp Company. Miss Grandin has just returned to the Imp Company after an engagement on the Pacific Coast, where she went two years ago as leading lady under director Thomas Ince, of Bison 101, Kaybee, and Broncho films.

Last January Miss Grandin went to the Universal where she played leads in Bison, Powers, and Rex films, at that company's Pacific Coast studios. Her return to New York, a month ago, was to resume her connection with the Imp Company, where she obtained her first recognition as a screen favorite.

Miss Grandin, it will be remembered, followed Miss Mary Pickford at the Imp as leading lady, playing opposite King Baggott. She comes from a family of performers, and her debut dates back to the times when she was just able to toddle across the stage.

LEGAL FIGHT OVER THE HORSLEY STOCK

There is a legal fight under way for the ownership of the shares of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company's stock formerly owned by David Horsley, to which both Carl Laemmle and P. A. Powers lay claim.

Justice Goff issued a Supreme Court order recently on Mr. Laemmle, president of the company, bidding him and the Universal to show cause why a permanent order should not be issued restraining Mr. Laemmle from transferring, disposing, or doing anything else with the stock involved which comprises 1,450 shares of Common, and 1,250 Preferred stock.

By mutual consent the attorneys have adjourned the hearing until next Thursday. In the meantime it has been agreed by all concerned to abide by the injunction until the matter has been settled at the hearing.

Although the dog days are upon us feature film activities are not paralyzed. A. J. Xydias, of Houston, Tex., has purchased the rights on "The Shadow of Evil" for Texas and Southern Oklahoma. A. A. Weiland, of the Weiland Feature Film Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., and J. Singer, of the Attractive Feature Film Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., who were in town this week, announce that they are now obtaining bookings on "Branded for Life." Murray F. Beier, of the Emby Feature Film Co., of New York City, is now booking "Branded for Life" as are also W. E. Greene, of Boston, Mass.; the Golden Gate Film Exchange, San Francisco, Cal.; Northwestern Feature Film Co., Portland, Ore., and the M. & F. Feature Film Co., Chicago, Ill.

Philadelphia, Pa.—Geo. Hogg is estimating on plans for a moving picture theatre to be built at 1200 Girard avenue. Stuckert & Sloan are the architects.

GEN. CUSTER'S NIECES ARRIVE FROM THE EAST

Captain Clifford, Custer's aide, while en route to Fort Wallace is met by Neesha, an Indian maiden, who pleads with him to come to the rescue of her sweetheart, Swift Foot, who is engaged in deadly combat with Wolf Fang, a renegade Sioux. Clifford separates the combatants. The interference is misconstrued by Wolf Fang who mutters an oath of vengeance as he departs.

Clifford later captures a bootlegger who is selling

Enraged over this second interference, and inflamed by liquor, Wolf Fang incites his companions to attack an approaching stage coach which has, among its passengers, General Custer's two nieces, Gertrude and Phyllis. During the running fight betewen the stage coach guards and the Indians one of the guards is wounded and falls from the coach. He revives sufficiently to carry news of the attack to General Custer, who immediately goes to the rescue of the coach, routs the Indians, and brings his nieces safely to the fort.

Neesha reports to the chief of the tribe, Black Hawk, that Wolf Fang and his gang of renegades have attacked the coach. Custer sends Sergeant James to Fort Wallace to report the attack on the stage. Wolf Fang is driven from the camp, and later slays Sergeant James on the road. Gertrude and Phyllis leave the fort for a walk, and are attacked by Wolf Fang, who throws Gertrude into the river and carries Phyllis away on horseback.

MANAGER NOBLE BADLY BURNED

John Noble, director of the Dragon films, Albert Roscoe, his assistant, and Emmet Williams, the photographer, were badly burned at City Island, on Long Island Sound, by the premature explosion of a barrel of gunpowder on July 25th during the preparation of an Indian picture-play. Mr. Noble was taken to the Fordham Hospital in a serious condition as his entire body had been scorched and blistered. Mr. Roscoe and Mr. Williams escaped with less serious burns, but they will carry permanent scars.

The scene was set in a stockade on an Indian reservation. The play was being rehearsed by a large company, but the actors at the time of the explosion were so far in the background that they all escaped injury. Mr. Noble, in his capacity of manager of the Ryno Film Company, of 189 Terrace Place, City Island, producers of Dragon films, stood near the barrel directing the last details of the stage setting when the explosion took place. It was at first believed that Mr. Noble was likely to die, but his numerous friends will be glad to hear that the doctors now hold out hope of his ultimate recovery.

P. A. POWERS HEADS THE WARNER'S FEATURE FILM CO.

As we go to press news reaches us that P. A. Powers has accepted the office of president of the Warner's Feature Film Company. In the new organization, Mr. A. Warner will be vice-president and general manager; H. M. Warner, treasurer; H. M. Goetz, assistant treasurer, and J. A. McKinney, secretary. The feature productions already controlled by the Warner company will be augmented by the output of several manufacturers of superior films. The connection of Mr. Powers with the company will increase its capitalization for the purpose of greater operations and the making of satisfactory purchasing agreements. This will result in the Warner's Feature Film Company becoming one of the most important and successful distributing factors in the moving picture business.

MRS. FISKE IN "TESS OF THE D'URBERVILLES"

The motion picture rights of Thomas Hardy's novel, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," were recently secured by Daniel Frohman from Mr. Hardy and his publishers, Harper & Brothers. Mrs. Fiske some time ago entered into an arrangement with Mr. Frohman to present her dramatic creation of "Tess" before the camera. For some weeks the studio of the Famous Players Film Company has been occupied with the making of these pictures.

Mrs. Fiske approached the work with all her original enthusiasm for the role, and she has found it extraordinarily interesting. In the film play the story closely follows the novel, entirely departing from the form of the play made from it by Lorimer Stoddard. Many scenes, therefore, will be shown that were not seen in the dramatization.

The picture play will be given in five reels and will provide a complete evening's entertainment. A special company is being incorporated under the title of "The Mrs. Fiske Film Company" to exploit the films, which will be shown only in theatres of the first importance. The appearance of Mrs. Fiske in the picture drama in America is as significant as was that of Madame Bernhardt in France, and every detail has been looked to by the directors in order to make this a distinctly forward step in the motion picture field.

The contract with Mrs. Fiske was made some months ago, and it was then the intention that she should appear as Becky Sharp in "Vanity Fair," but later it was decided to substitute "Tess," as it was found to be admirably adapted to the form of pictorial narrative. The work has progressed rapidly and more than one hundred different scenes have been taken. The pictures will be released in the autumn.

Mrs. Fiske has been very much interested in the film drama for the past year or two, and has strong ideas upon its value and possibilities. She has deplored the inconsequential and often really harmful pictures that are so frequently shown, feeling that the appeal to the imagination and interest in the theatre which these moving pictures awaken in children is entirely in the wrong direction. It is her conviction that motion pictures have tremendous potentialities for the uplift of the theatre, and it was her interest in this phase of the question that led her to favorably consider the offers made for her personal appearance in the film drama. The work itself has been so novel and unlike any previous experience that it has been almost a holiday for her. After her long acting season, it has been a genuine relaxation, one which she has keenly enjoyed.

"Tess of the D'Urbervilles" is one of the masterpieces of the English language, and its film dramatization certainly marks an epoch in the field besides auguring much for the future. The appearance of our foremost actress in the best known work of a famous English novelist bestows upon the camera drama an importance and a dignity that it has not heretofore possessed.

An interesting development in connection with the "Tess" pictures is that the picture rights to the novel for the United Kingdom had been secured by an English company, but now that the American pictures actually present Mrs. Fiske as Tess, it is altogether likely that no pictures will be made in England but that the American films will be shown in both countries simultaneously.

TESS OBTAINS WORK AT THE DAIRY

For those who are not familiar with Thomas Hardy's novel or its dramatization the following synopsis of the main incidents may prove of interest:

The family of D'Urberville, who came into existence with the Conquest, degenerated and became practically extinct in 1700. Parson Tringham, a country clergyman, by the use of parish registers and a few heirlooms in possession of John Durbyfield, traces the lineage and establishes John as the direct descendant of the line.

John is a worthless sort of country pot house politician, lazy and slothful, holding his home under the English Copyhold law and with a large family whom he is unable to support.

Tess, the eldest daughter, is a beautiful girl who inherits all the weaknesses and passions of her ancestors. One day at a Maypole dance on the village green she meets and is attracted to a young man named Angel Clare, a stranger to the countryside, who out of diffidence or for other reasons, dances with every girl but Tess.

Stoke, a rich manufacturer, amasses a great fortune in the North of England, and on retiring buys a large tract of land in the South and adopts the name of Stoke D'Urberville, adding an extinct family name to increase the importance of his own. He dies after possessing himself of the name and estate, leaving his blind wife and his son, Alec, to enjoy it. Tess's mother, a simple country woman, conceives the idea of sending Tess to claim relationship with her supposed rich relatives, for the material advancement of the family.

Tess encounters Alec, who falls in love at first sight, and makes arrangements for her to take care of the poultry on the farm, but does not confide in his blind mother or admit the relationship. Alec in time seduces Tess and she returns to her home, where her child is born in disgrace.

Eventually the child dies and Tess starts in to make the best of her ruined life. She obtains employment as a dairymaid at a large farm where a great many people are employed. Angel Clare is at this farm taking a course of instruction preparatory to taking up farming in Brazil on a large scale. The two proceed to fall in love and once more Tess's future begins to promise happiness. She is torn by conflicting emotions. After writing an account of her former false step she puts it under Angel's door. He doesn t find it, and Tess, under the impression that he has read it and has forgiven her sin, agrees to marry him.

After the ceremony, and while sitting before the open fire Angel tells of a former fall from grace, and Tess promptly forgives him. He takes her in his arms and in the dim firelight, thinking he already knows her past life, she proceeds to relate in detail her seduction by Alec D'Urberville. Angel, who comes of a puritanical family, is so shocked by the revelation that for some days he appears unbalanced and distracted. He decides to go to Brazil alone, leaving Tess in England till he can bring himself to forgive her.

Tess returns to her home, and the money Angel has left her is soon used up. She does not hear from Angel, and after several months she decides to go to work rather than ask Angel's father for help, and parts with the diamonds that came to her as Angel's wife. She obtains employment at a farm, often being compelled to work in the fields.

Tess writes a passionate letter to Angel in Brazil, but receives no answer. She makes a journey to Angel's home, but turns back at the door. No word comes from Angel, but she receives word that her father is dying and hurries to his side. Old John Durbyfield dies, and as the copyhold expires with his life, the family becomes homeless. They pack their effects and wander off, finally seeking shelter under the wall of the church at Kinghsere, in the shadow of the D'Urberville tombs. In this plight they are found by Alec D'Urberville who rescues them and provides for the starving family on condition that Tess will again become his mistress. Two years have elapsed since Angel went away and Tess, therefore, makes the sacrifice for the sake of her family.

Alec and Tess reside at Sandwich. Angel arrives in England and goes to his home to obtain news of his wife. They have heard nothing of her. Angel finds Tess's mother, who is comfortably provided for and from her learns of Tess's whereabouts but is not told that she has become the mistress of Alec D'Urberville. Angel finds Tess, and learns the truth. He realizes that he alone is responsible for her present condition.

Tess is torn with despair as she sees her last chance for happiness slip away. Alec D'Urberville, who is in bed and learns the identity of the visitor, taunts Tess and angers her. She picks up a knife from the bureau and drives it through his heart. Tess dresses quickly, and leaves the house to find Angel. She overtakes him, and together they start across Salisbury Plain. A storm overtakes them, and they find shelter in a furnished but untenanted house. The storm continues for five days and Tess experiences the only joy she has ever known. At the abatement of the storm they leave the house and while they sleep on the ruins of the old Druid Temple at Stonehenge the detectives arrive and arrest Tess for the murder of Alec D'Urberville.

Liza Lu, the second sister of Tess, and Angel Clare walk up the hill overlooking the old city of Winchester. As the clock strikes eight their eyes are fastened on the flagstaff over the penitentiary. The fresh morning breeze shows something fluttering at its peak. It is the black flag, and they both kneel in prayer.

BIG BUSINESS FOR THE KINEMATOPHONE

William J. Counihan, president and general manager of the Kinematophone, with offices in the George Cohan Theatre Building, 1483 Broadway, New York City, reports that this necessary accessory to motion picture theatres has so rapidly met with the approval of exhibitors throughout the country, that the company has been compelled to enlarge its factory facilities to turn out the orders on hand. The Kinematophone is an invention by Gaston Anchini, and was designed to give life and realism to moving pictures. It is operated by the pianist, and is built similar to a piano, all of the effects being produced by a pressure of the keys—galloping horses, auto motor and horn, rumble of trains, fire engines, crying baby, ocean waves—are some of the many effects produced by this wonderful instrument. So simple is the Kinematophone that a child can operate it after one demonstration.

MONEY'S MERCILESS MIGHT
A Gaumont Three-Reel Feature Release

Rarely amidst the host of super-excellent feature films created by the house of Gaumont has so fine a subject as this been permitted to draw the sympathetic tears of susceptible femininity or cause the case-hardened male patron of the picture theatre to conceal his emotion by stentoriously blowing his nose. "Money's Merciless Might" is a true tale of the American girl of to-day, sacrificing self for the sake of the widowed mother left penniless by the sudden death of the rashly speculative broker. It takes us from the land of the dollar to beautiful Southern France, and much of the action passes amid the lovely semi-tropical scenery of the Riviera.

The first part shows us the happy home of a prosperous American broker, Julius P. Leclere, the grandson of early French settlers in this country. His daughter Suzanne is possessed of rare beauty and charm, and her attractiveness appeals with irresistible force to many a suitor. It remains, however, for a daring young French aviator to capture the heart of the charming Suzanne, and it is a case of love at first sight when the two meet on the aviation field, close to New York City. But Serge Renot, although a capable and daring flying-man, proves to be unsound in his ideas of business morality, and moreover is not blessed with a goodly store of wealth by any means. This information is ferreted out by the powerful capitalist, William Runciman, who desires nothing so much as an alliance with the fair daughter of his friend Leclere. Runciman and Leclere visit Renot's club and discover the young man gambling heavily, and Leclere is strengthened in his determination to put a stop to Renot's suit. But the broker has not seen the storm gathering around him. His speculations fail, one after another; his Liberian stock drops to zero; other stocks fall to vanishing point, and Leclere wilts under the crushing blow. Seized with sudden heart failure, the broker expires.

A sad blow indeed is this to the broker's womenfolk. Suzanne realizes that union with a penniless aviator is impossible in their present straightened circumstances, and that the only way that she and her mother can continue to live in comfort is for the daughter to make a rich alliance. So with sadly diminished income they resolve to spend just one more season in Europe, and depart for the sunny lands of the Riviera. Serge Renot returns to his beloved Paris.

At Cannes, Suzanne is introduced to a French lieutenant named de Vergne, the eldest son of a wealthy Countess, and the officer promptly falls head over heels in love with the beautiful American girl. Suzanne likes him sufficiently to promise to become his wife. But here upon the scene appears William Runciman, whose chief creed is that his money can procure everything he may want. Runciman invites Renot to Cannes and shows him Suzanne and de Vergne returning from a ride in the woods. Renot is furiously angry, and with jealous rage he challenges the army man to a duel. Next morning we see the duel take place, and de Vergne is badly wounded. Renot calls on the Lecleres, but Runciman has forestalled him. Suzanne tells the aviator that she can never forgive him, and that her former love has turned to hatred. She rushes to the house where Countess de Vergne and her son reside, only to learn that her fiance and his mother have departed.

A few days later Serge Renot writes a pathetic note to Suzanne, appealing once more to her love, and stating that unless she will relent from her present attitude he has resolved to commit suicide in a dramatic manner while in the air. At this proof of his devotion, Suzanne does relent, and hurries off to the aviation ground to prevent Serge carrying out his intention. But she gets there too late. Renot has started. We see his aeroplane sailing through the cerulean blue of the southern skies like a swallow on the wing, when—the explosion takes place and the aviator falls to the ground, crushed to death beneath the wreck of his machine.

A month elapses. Suzanne and her mother are back in the New York house, but it is a sad home-coming. The sheriffs have been busy and everything of value bears a justice's seal upon it. Poor, distracted Suzanne knows not what to do. At one time she contemplates a speedy release from earthly troubles, but the thought of her helpless mother being left alone to battle with the world deters her. And then she makes the supreme sacrifice. William Runciman has told her that when all else fails, when her friends have all deserted her, when everything looks black, all she has to do is to send him the single word, "Come." The story closes with Suzanne addressing a note to the financier, couched in the following brief manner: "Come. Suzanne."

The acting throughout this narrative is of the highest order, the artists portraying the principal roles giving finished renditions, and the realistic scenes of the aviation grounds, the aeroplanes, the delightful scenery of the Riviera, etc., all go to make up a splendidly illustrated story of real life of the present day.

This film will be released on August 15th.

EDISON NOTES

Edison announces "Dolly Varden" for release in the near future. As an extract from "Barnaby Rudge" this film is sure to be of interest. The production has been most artistic throughout, with Mabel Trunnelle in the leading role.

* * * *

Gladys Hulette, whose delightful performance of Beth in "Little Women" will never be forgotten by lovers of the artistic, has returned to the Edison studio and is soon to appear in some very prominent roles. Miss Hulette, though a very young girl, has had valuable experience, playing, among others, with Mme. Nazimova, Bertha Kalish and Henry Miller. Her portrayal of Ivan in "The Doll's House," David in "The Kreutzer Sonata" and her beautiful presentation of the long and difficult role in "The Blue Bird" stamp Miss Hulette as being accomplished far beyond her years.

* * * *

Laura Sawyer, the popular Edison leading lady, has been honored by election to the motion picture chapter of Mu Gamma, a well-known college sorority. As only a very few of the well-known stars have been chosen by the society, Miss Sawyer's election is a fitting commentary upon her immense popularity.

At the time Miss Sawyer received the notification she was at Easthampton, Long Island, where the magnificent home of Albert Herter, the artist, was used in the production of "The Ghost of Granleigh." Here Miss Sawyer enjoyed the unique distinction of riding in a gondola which was once the property of Robert Browning.

* * * *

Burt Briggs, who has appeared in numerous recent Edison films, involuntarily added his name to the long list of those who have been wounded in the cause. While playing one of the leading parts in a houseboat story, Mr. Briggs swam out to the houseboat with Harry Kendall, intending to steal a rowboat which was moored to the houseboat. Kendall climbed aboard the houseboat to unfasten the painter while Briggs stayed in the water. Having accomplished his purpose, Kendall attempted to dive overboard but his wet feet slipped and he fell directly upon Briggs, striking him full in the face with his knee. The blow stunned Briggs for a moment and he sank. The water revived him quickly, however, and being an expert swimmer, he had no difficulty in reaching the boat from which Ashley Miller was directing operations.

Examination showed that the nose was broken and Briggs is now masquerading behind an array of plaster that would do credit to a football hero.

MISS FLORENCE LAWRENCE JOINS UNIVERSAL FORCES

Famous Moving Picture Actress Who Has Appeared in Some of the Most Popular Comedies, Dramas and Melodramas of the Films Obeys Call of the Camera—Had Retired to Rose Culture

The announcement that Miss Florence Lawrence, one of the most popular and beautiful faces seen on the screen, is to join the Universal forces will be greeted with delight by thousands of her admirers in all parts of the country, for it will signalize her return to the motion picture stage as well. Miss Lawrence never made an announcement that she was to retire; she merely dropped out. Such a procedure usually results in this country in an actress or a public man or any one much in the public eye being soon forgotten. This is a busy country and we are too much occupied with what is before us to worry about what is not. But this did not happen in the case of Miss Lawrence. Her public did not forget her. When her face ceased to appear on the Lubin films, she began to receive hundreds of letters from people all over the United States asking why she was not acting any more.

The actual reason for her retirement was her farm in Rivervale, N. J. The actress lives on a fifty-acre estate about fifteen miles from Fort Lee, N. J. The farm is all but inaccessible to anything except an automobile, and this is the way Miss Lawrence reaches it. There is a railroad connection a few miles away but the service on the local division is too uncertain to bother with.

Last spring, as the buds were beginning to burst, and every green thing was putting forth its best efforts to make itself beautiful, Miss Lawrence caught the spirit of the country as never before. She had long cherished an ambition to grow a hybrid rose, which she could call all her own. She has always been passionately fond of flowers and particularly roses. Now she would take the opportunity to gratify her ambition and become a rose fancier on a scale not possible when one has to devote all the day to the production of moving pictures. So she quietly dropped out of the pictures and retired to the farm at Rivervale, there to apply herself to the "Florence Rose." She had studied Luther Burbank's methods and she set to work to cultivate a rose which would fill the longings of her imagination. It is well under way now.

But in the meantime the directors of the Universal were looking for just such a person as Miss Lawrence, and, in fact, for Miss Lawrence herself, and when the Universal wants anything badly enough it usually gets it. It got Miss Lawrence.

It is for that reason that this popular screen favorite will be seen on the Universal program. She will begin at once a series of two- and three-reel films under the direction of her husband, Harry Salter. They will be released under the Victor brand and will be available in the course of a month or two. The directors will see to it that they will be among the most important films ever released.

Miss Lawrence is an acquisition to moving picture ranks through the legitimate. Six years ago she came to the Edison and has been successively with the Vitagraph, Biograph, Imp and Lubin companies. One of the first of the famous pictures in which she appeared was "The Dispatch Girl," a military Vitagraph drama. In the Biograph she appeared in "The Resurrection" and "Lady Helen's Escapade." In the Imp her best known pictures are "Mother Love" and "The Maelstrom," and in the Lubin she is best remembered in "The Hoyden" and "A Show Girl's Strategem."

S. S. HUTCHINSON AND FAMILY IN CALIFORNIA

President and Mrs. S. S. Hutchinson and their two sons, Winston and Hobard, arrived by motor from Los Angeles and will remain at Santa Barbara, Cal., until September. They are at the Arlington. Their colored chauffeur did remarkably well for his first coast experience with a new Cadillac. They came by way of the Casitas and no trouble was experienced.

Mr. Hutchinson will devote much of his attention immediately to the production of special features. Mrs. Hutchinson and the boys were given their first view of the new studio by moonlight. As time permits the entire family will indulge in more or less touring, and a trip to San Francisco, with stops at important points, is in prospect.

The younger son was named after Winston Churchill, the author, at the time he was becoming a literary light. The Hutchinsons are not acquainted with the author, but were great admirers of his works.

With the assistance of Commodore H. Bull, Lorimer Johnston directed the "Flying A" stock company with many supernumeraries, through some exciting Philippine fights. Commodore Bull, who is retired, saw service in the islands. The scenes were laid at the Gillespie and George E. Coleman places in Montecito. Some native Californians made excellent bolomen. The scenes are part of "For the Flag," that carries from West Point to the Islands. The neighborhood house has been used as a Philippine military barracks. Commodore Bull said the work and settings were perfect.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA
Reliance release Aug. 14.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

"The Hodcarrier's Dream"

THE Hodcarrier's Dream" is the title of an impossible script submitted to a New York company. This is only a sample of the hundreds of scripts that are received each week by the film concerns. Some of the letters accompanying the manuscripts are exceedingly pathetic while others are laughable. But the humble petitions for financial aid are less numerous than the brazen demands for money made by some writers. The author of an impossible script wrote this one:

> Here is a scenario that I will sell for $50 cash. It is one of the most brilliant picture plays ever thought out and will revolutionize the entire industry. You cannot afford to show any lack of brains by refusing this one. Your future success as a motion picture company depends on this kind of a production. I have several more of similar excellence that I will sell at the same price.

Maybe you think the above letter is exaggerated. It is not.

One script was received by a Chicago editor the other day, in which all the characters were goats and polar bears. In rejecting the script the editor stated that he was the only "goat" in the entire company and that the polar bears were on ice. A letter came back like this:

> The trade papers say you are in the market for animal stories. I sent you an animal story in good faith. I have other animal stories which I will send elsewhere.

This letter is not overdrawn and is also given here to show what fools some mortals be. The moral is for you to write no letters to the editors and to use good common sense when writing your plots and submitting them to the markets.

The Warren Method

Giles R. Warren, formerly editor for Lubin, Powers, Imp, Victor, etc., etc., and who later became a successful director, has a method of his own in writing scripts. He sits with his eyes closed and visualizes the action. He dictates what he sees in his imagination to a stenographer. A logical script is the complete result. He sees his characters perform in his mind's eye. He shuts out everything else but the action surrounding the plot he is developing. It is a mighty good method. Close your eyes and see a screen in your imagination. Let the children of your brain do their work there upon that screen and in the environment you wish. Of course it takes imagination and invention. But you must have imagination to become a successful writer. Mr. Warren has written plays that have made Florence Lawrence, Mary Pickford, Fritzie Brunette, and other stars famous. He showed us his working scripts the other day. They are models of neatness with scarcely an alteration or erasure. The reason for this is that he visualizes only the essential action and all superfluous matter has been primarily eliminated. Mr. Warren is not now in the market for scripts. He has within the past six weeks turned down three flattering offers for both editorship and directorship.

Why They Do Not Sell

Marc Edmund Jones, in the current number of the Photoplay Magazine, tells why his manuscripts do not sell. We quote some excellent points won by Marc through the aid of Dame Experience. "There is only one rule for success and that is hard work. The lure of pictureplaywriting is the lure of something for nothing. It is the idea of sitting down and dashing off a story in a couple of hours that is responsible for the poor scripts, eliminating from the discussion those who do not possess the latent ability; and it is the glutting of the market with these poor scripts that makes the way a mighty hard one for the writer who is anxious to study and learn, and who is willing to work hard. There is a word of encouragement for those who are willing to work and study. Practically all the leading picture playwrights in the country are writers who started out as amateurs and have succeeded in working to the top. Although scripts are hard to sell, there is a large market and a good market for them, and a well-written script can always command a good price. The writer who perseveres can win success."

And to all of the above we say Amen! But when the writer has reached the top he finds it a precarious top. He must rise and fall by almost every submission. If his work falls below standard, as his work sometimes will, the star writer's script is rejected just as promptly as the work of one not so well known. In other words, the writer who has risen to the top must continue to turn out tip-top work to retain that proud eminence. And the fact is plainly discernible that others are soon to become the tip-top writers, for many of the stars of yesterday are going stale to-day. And it was ever so.

A Systematic Fellow

Epes Winthrop Sargent, well-known author and editor, entertained us in his office recently. He has a place for everything and everything is in its place. He uses an Oliver No. 5 with a blind keyboard, has all his working tools to his hand, and his card index files are models of their kind. Sargent believes in being methodical. It is a good habit. He is the kind of workman that can turn out more stuff in an hour than the tyro can in twenty-four. Why? Because he has things systematized. He has his hours for work and his hours for play. He knows what that day's work is before he starts it—there is nothing haphazard in his methods. It is well for every script writer to employ system. There is a publication devoted to it. Get the magazine and read it (we are not paid for this advice). Know what you are going to do and accomplish it in the most expeditious and workmanlike manner possible.

Pertinent Pointers

Most editors like the scene plot. It does not necessarily go on the first page.

A property list, or "prop" list, is unnecessary unless requested by some director.

Don't become too minute in your description of business. Don't say "An expression of infinite joy illuminated the face of Madge." When the lovers are reunited you can depend upon the director telling Madge what to do.

Avoid trick work wherever possible. White the simply constructed story or you may "fade away" yourself.

There is a good market for two-reel stuff, but learn to write the single-reel story before embarking upon more difficult seas.

Any editor can be tempted with a good farce comedy. However, good farce comedies are scarce. A comic plot rarely reads like comedy.

Do not pay out good money to have your scripts typed. Type them yourself. You can rent a machine for $3 monthly or you can buy one on small installments. You should learn to compose on a typewriter. Many never learn the trick, however, writing their stories in longhand and then typing them.

Editor of Universal Company, Pacific Coast studios, states that the Western company is not now in the market for one or two-reel Indian stories but can use Cuban, Philippine and Settler stories. No explanatory letters. All scripts must be typewritten.

"The disturbed conditions in Mexico open the way for a series of strong dramatic plots laid within that environment," is the tip sent out by Editor Wilbert Melville, Western Kalem Company, 4550 Pasadena avenue, Los Angeles, Cal.

Do not designate elaborate settings to very short or unimportant scenes. Remember that the "reception-room of Millionaire Jones' palatial home" may cost considerable money to set up. The best rule is to recast your plot in more humble surroundings, which frequently are the more colorful and at the same time, give your story a better opportunity to market. Sell stories and do not try to see how much expense you can put upon a manufacturer.

Do you know a story when you see it? Many do not. It's a common failing with cub reporters and amateur literary workers. When we say, "he has a nose for news," we mean the newspaper man can scent a story of tenseness, interest and romance when others pass it by. The same rule is applicable to pictureplay-writing. Have a nose for plots. Scent the story when others pass it by. It is a faculty that can be cultivated. We called on a script writer the other day and gratuitously gave him an idea through our actions and conversation. Before we left his office we knew he had caught the story and was hugging himself in the fond belief that we did not know he had caught it. It was just a case of two trained minds working subconsciously along the same channels. We could have rushed home and used that idea. We didn't. He will use it one of these days and plume himself. There is everything in knowing a story when you see one.

On the Campus

One concern urges you to "become a pictureplaywright; no correspondence school." When you bite, they send you a pamphlet on how to write scripts.

"I will bring you to the open door" reads the literature of another shark. If he means the editorial door it is liable to be slammed in your face.

A New York "college" is out with a rehash of that yarn where a script writer asserted three years ago that he has made $1,500 in a year during half his working time. Then only $2 in advance is asked for the "personal help and guidance system guaranteed to have you make $3,000 a year if you work all your working time. The "school" also announces there is "150 per cent increase in scenario prices." Why spend your good money?

Studying the Dictionary

A gent named Webster once wrote a book called Webster's Unabridged Dictionary. Ever study it? If there is one habit that a literary worker of any kind should cultivate more assiduously than another it is to study Webster. Next to ideas, words are the essential of important things. The greatest writers have the dictionary habit. No worker needs it more than the writer of moving picture plots. The art of making one word work for eight others is not an easy art to acquire. The art of brevity (which is the soul of wit) is seemingly an art which some would-be picture playwrights refuse to study. Get down to the dictionary and study it. Many of the great men noted for the wealth and beauty of their language have acknowledged their indebtedness to Noah Webster.

Read It Aloud

Ever read your scripts aloud? It helps sometimes. It is not necessary that you have a listener. Just imagine you have a room full of delightful auditors. Very often your reading will point out the weak places in your manuscript for you will be brushing by the parts that have been difficult to get exactly correct. If your script will not balance right, try reading it aloud sometime. This advice may sound queer to some, but you just try it. It has helped others and may help you.

About Your Friends

Do not put your friends in stories of any kind. Change the names of the localities you write of so that they will not be readily recognizable. Many people do not relish having their names appear in plots and stories and you may get into trouble. Work with dignity and propriety.

The Adventures of Marc Edmund

Marc Edmund Jones rightly believes that his first year's record as a writer of scripts will contain interesting lore for others. We give it just as he wrote it and our only comment is that we think he attaches too much importance to "fiction stars." They must rise and fall by their work as picture playwrights, not as short story writers. We wish Jones much success in his new field and will pull for him to achieve a record. His letter:

"I am closing my records for my first year of photoplay writing, and have drawn off the figures to see just what I have accomplished. I first started writing them on the 'tip' of a boy friend who had tried, and with the idea I could make some money on the side easily. I telephoned the Essanay Film Co. and they sent me a small book called 'How to Write a Photoplay,' which is now out of print, and later, on writing a circular letter to each of the licensed manufacturers, I added to it a sample scenario sent out by Lubin. These were my sole guides. I have never had a script criticised; had any connection with a school; nor used any of the text books. When I first started to write I did not watch the films on the screen, although this was a mistake, and I had sold scripts before I saw the inside of a studio. I was not fitted for photoplay writing, in that I had just previously failed as a newspaper reporter and had only schooling through two years of high school to my credit. I developed the dramatic instinct, but it came slow, and impeded my progress. My first sales were due either to novelty or to the latent artistic sense that has led me to write 'pretty' business into most of my stuff, and to-day I still find melodrama the hardest to write. Although easily a dramatic rather than a farce writer, I have had much more success with farce than melodrama. My first debt of gratitude is to Mrs. Parsons, of Essanay, who saw that I could make good, and encouraged me to keep up the fight. She was my early critic, and went out of her way to develop me. My second debt of gratitude is to Sargent, on whose advice I went to New York, and on whose advice I remained in New York, to meet with the Inquest Club all during its first season. My third and last debt of gratitude is to Mrs. Breuil, of Vitagraph, whose faith in what she believes is my latent ability has led me to take a step now of which I shall speak later, and to whom I am indebted for a fine shade of criticism that has helped me to improve my work 100 per cent. To Phil Lang, of Kalem; John F. Pribyl, of Selig; Geo. Hennessey and Dr. Stockton and to many others I am indebted for advice and encouragement, and, on the whole, I feel that the pictureplay writing 'game' includes a mighty fine bunch of people. In my first year, or up to date, I have written 57 scenarios, and of these I have sold 27, or nearly one out of two. At the start I averaged one of five. I have raised the average, and will continue to do so by means of rewriting and revising each script until it finally sells. In the year I made 49 rewrites and revisions and, in order to make the 27 sales, made 327 submissions, or had 300 rejections exactly to date. In the year I have seen my prices jump from $20 to $50. I now get the latter price from several companies, and favor them in sending a script out. I continue to circulate a script until it sells, however, and always take whatever price I am offered, merely giving first choice to the company that pays the highest and gives the quickest decision. My 27 scripts netted $745.00, or an average of $27.60. I pay particular attention to the preparation of the script itself, and was pleased to find, in one licensed studio, that they had been using my scripts as a model to show would-be writers who would come in. Of the twenty-seven sales, ten completed pictures have been booked for release to date, and, of the reviews to date, there has been no criticism of the STORY, or my part of the picture, in any case. As there are many wild-eyed and false claims made by some of those in the business, I have adopted the practice of advertising my releases, running a card each week, and thus putting myself on record in the case of any picture I may claim. Believing that this policy of frankness and openness will win out in the long run, I am thus writing this long letter to you, so that you can print it if you think it will help the beginner. Of my 57 total scripts, eight are not wholly mine, in that I have taken the idea of some friend, and have paid a percentage. The working up of the idea, etc., is mine in every case, and, as I have found such an arrangement unsatisfactory, I have refused to collaborate on any more. Of the 57 (varieties), three are farce, and two of them are sold; two are straight comedy, with one sold; one is comedy drama, not sold; twenty-one are straight drama, with ten sold; and nineteen are melodrama, with six sold. Of the remaining eleven, seven I classify as Idyls, with five sold, and four as Fantasies, with three sold. These two classifications I almost feel are my own, as aside from Mrs. Breuil, I know no writer selling them, and as my greatest success has been under these heads. Of the eleven under these two heads, four are what I call Interpretative Adaptations, differing from the ordinary adaptation in that it is not a story built around some song or poem, but whatever it is that is adapted is a vital part of the story, and is so worked in that to see the picture is to understand thoroughly the meaning of the song or poem, as the case may be. Two more of the four are Biblical, the 1st Psalm being booked for release under the title 'The Tree and the Chaff,' and the other being an interpretative adaptation of the celebrated 13th Chapter of Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, now under production. The fourth, an adaptation of an old fairy tale, is yet unsold. In looking through my plays I find that fourteen are based upon original verse, a stunt I have dropped since so much attention is being given to the foreign market. Twelve involve trick work, other than the ordinary visions, dissolves, etc. Ten are child stories. Thirty-one, out of the 57, put over a strong lesson. Nine are costume plays. Two are educational—showing in one the invention of the organ, and in the other the invention of the guitar. I also find that I have 'pulled' a lot of psychological stuff. Two of these are in exposition of the groping pre-adolescent mind of childhood. One is a psychological analysis of the nature of temptation, and four are psychological analyses of the different phases of love. I have two that go into the effect of environment and training of the ideals and character, and another which is a psychological analysis of the pre-adolescent influence of the home on the child. The beauty of the thing is that most of this fancy stuff is sold, although I still have one or two on my hands. The only point in the whole thing is this—when a man wails that the manufacturers will not look at anything outside of the beaten track, it is a reasonable wager that the matter is not properly prepared. I certainly have sold more weird, trick, costume, symbolical, and genuinely peculiar stuff than the average. Just at present there seems to be a mania for melodrama, and I am keeping in the beaten track, but, while there is no reason that everyone should rush in and try to get as far away from the beaten track as possible, I feel pretty sure that, if my experience counts for anything, any picture, no matter how far from the beaten track it may be, can find a market if it is properly prepared.

Just now the thing that worries me is the invasion of the field by literary stars, who, aided by their reputation in the literary field, get a price I cannot get, and sell scripts which I wouldn't write, and couldn't sell if I wrote them. There are many big pictures which have been written by the literary invaders, but I maintain that their average is not up to that of the trained photoplay writer, who is sidetracked in their favor, and their stuff, being bought at a higher figure, naturally gets a more careful and better production. And so here's my latest stunt: I figure that photoplay writing is a better training for fiction writing than fiction writing is for it. If the literary people are going to swarm in and 'crab' the game of the photoplay writer, it is up to the photoplay writer to retaliate, and there's where little Willie comes in, asking all those who are in a position to do so to follow. With unbecoming lack of modesty, and the rest of it, I hereby give notice that, as in one year I have entered the photoplay game a rank amateur, and risen to a position with the leaders, so now, in my second year, I am going to sail into the fiction writing game, and SHOW UP the gosh-dinged bunch of writers that have come in to help me eat my meat. A year from now I undertake to have as big a name as a fiction writer as has any fiction writer that has entered the photoplay game. And, so that the humiliation may be the greater, please bear in mind that this is to be done by a man without even a high school education; who will have to write enough photoplays between times to eat; and one who, to date, has never had a short story published, and who, outside of photoplay and non-payment work, has never written anything for publication."

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

DR. CRATHERN'S EXPERIMENT

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Vitagraph Release)

WILLIAM CRATHERN was born into a wealthy family but at his birth there was no rejoicing. The parents' hearts were filled with sorrow and bitterness, for their son was a hopeless cripple. As is usual in such cases, they felt that a heavy burden had been laid upon them by an unseen hand, never once asking themselves if, in any way, they had been to blame.

When the child was old enough to study, a governess was employed and he was left entirely to her care. Everything that money could buy the little boy had, but the thing without price, to which every child has a right, he knew nothing of. Consequently he was much alone and given to thoughts far beyond his years.

When William was fourteen years of age a tutor came to take the place of the governess. He made great progress and in two years had planned his future. Then he went to his father.

"Father, you have told me that you have plenty of money and can give me anything I want. I want to go away to school where I can prepare for a medical college."

"But, William——"

"Yes, I know I am deformed and not very strong but that is what I would rather do. I can take my time."

"But wouldn't something else be better—more appropriate,"

William smiled sadly. "I suppose it does seem queer for a person like me to try to help others. But that is what I want to do. I want to help those who have no money to pay for the help they need. There must be a lot of people who could be cured if there was only somebody who would help them at the right time and not expect any pay."

The boy spoke so earnestly that the father said no more.

The next year William went to preparatory school and the year after to medical college.

In the second year of his course the boy's mother died, and in the fourth year his father, leaving him a fortune.

Almost from the day of his graduation the young physician's work began. With him it was not a question of where he could make the most money, but where he could do the most good. He decided it would be best to stay in his own city, where the people knew who he was.

At first William connected himself with a charitable society, so that he might become better and more quickly acquainted with those who needed him most.

It was not long until Dr. Crathern was regarded by those he attended as an angel of mercy. Every day he made his rounds, many times relieving more distress than mere physical pain.

One day, about two years after the beginning of his career, the doctor was passing the door of a flat into which a new family had just moved. He was suddenly stopped by the sound of blows and the sobbing of a girl. He knocked quickly at the door. A woman with anger-flushed face threw it open and stood defying him.

"What do you want here?" she asked roughly.

"I heard crying and want to know who is in distress."

"I guess you've got no call to come here pryin' into my business."

"Pardon me," said the doctor gently, "but you were cruelly whipping some one and I must make it my business to see who it was."

"It was that hussy there," growled the woman, shaking her fist at a figure huddled in a corner. "She's always makin' a mess somewhere. She spilled dirty dishwater on the floor and I'd just scrubbed it."

"Come here, my girl," coaxed Dr. Crathern softly.

Drawn by the gentle voice the girl arose. The doctor saw that she was unusually beautiful in spite of her soiled and torn dress and her tear-stained face.

"Come here," he said again.

The girl started toward him, putting out her hand as though groping her way in the dark.

"Dear God, she's blind!" exclaimed the doctor. "And you dared to beat a blind girl because she spilled water. Shame!"

The woman hung her head and turned away grumbling.

Dr. Crathern looked into the sightless eyes. "How old are you, child?"

"Fifteen."

"Why, you don't look more than twelve. You need proper care and happiness." He took her hand and she clung to him like a little child.

"Who are you, sir?" she almost whispered.

"Doctor Crathern. I shall be in the house to-morrow and shall stop in to see you. Are you this woman's daughter?"

"No, sir, her neice. I live with her and my uncle."

"What is their name?"

"Marley."

"And yours?"

"Hope Langdon."

The woman on the other side of the room turned quickly toward them. "I guess you can see she ain't like us. Her ma was my husband's sister. She married a man 'way up in life and Hope takes after her pa. His folks wouldn't have nothin' to do with him after he got married and when he and her ma both took fever and died we had to take the child. A lot of expense she's been to us, too, not bein' able to see as much as an owl in the daytime."

"Would you like to be rid of her if she was well cared for and happy?"

"Lord, I would that!"

"Well, I'd love to have Hope come live with me if she thought she'd care to. When she got stronger she could go to a school for the blind. Would you like that, Hope?"

"Oh, yes, sir, if Aunt would let me."

"I ain't got the say. You'll have to see the old man."

It was agreed that Dr. Crathern should come back the next evening and talk matters over with the girl's uncle. He had taken such a liking to Hope that he felt it would be a disappointment hard to bear if he could not have his wish granted.

The next evening he went as early as possible. In a very short time the doctor saw that the arrangement would be entirely a matter of money.

"Well," he said to the uncle, "if I pay you five hundred dollars, will you be willing to have the girl legally put under my guardianship?"

The man eagerly assented.

"Do you want to go, Hope?" asked Dr. Crathern.

"Yes, indeed. Please take me soon," she whispered.

As soon as possible the legal papers were drawn up and Hope was taken to the house of her guardian.

If Doctor Crathern had not already believed in the young girl's natural refinement of taste, he would have been convinced of it the first day of her establishment in his household. She felt her way around the rooms, running her hands gently over the different objects, showing plainly by her delighted expressions that she appreciated their beauty and richness.

"When you have grown quite strong and well," Crathern promised her, "then you shall go where you can learn to read of beautiful things and to make some, too. In fact, Hope, you may learn anything you may fancy."

The doctor and his ward grew more and more fond of one another, until, when a year later, she was sent to a school for the blind, the parting was very hard.

The girl learned rapidly. Her hungry mind was ready and eager to absorb all the knowledge presented to it.

The reports of Hope's progress filled the lonely doctor with joy, but not so much as did the sight of the girl when she came back to him. She had developed into a most beautiful young woman, and she was not in the house long when her guardian knew that the love he felt for her was very different from that he had felt before she went away.

All this time the girl knew not that her beloved friend was in any way different from other men. He knew that she did not know and he thought if she loved him as he loved her it would be no wrong to marry her and keep her in ignorance of his deformity. For the doctor feared if she knew she would shrink from him as something unlovely, loving beauty as she did.

"I do love you," she told him when he spoke to her of his love. "How could I help loving one so beautiful as you are in every way?"

"But you have not seen me," protested the doctor.

"One does not need physical eyes to see into the soul," she answered, "and I am sure all of you is as beautiful as what I have seen with my inner eye."

At this Doctor Crathern's heart sank, but he had not the courage to shatter her happiness and his. The day for the wedding was set and the announcement made.

Soon after this Doctor Crathern had a sudden visit from Dr. Arthur Spencer, who had attended medical college with him. He had become an eye specialist and was making a reputation in his profession.

Crathern told his friend at once of his engagement to his ward and also that she was hopelessly blind.

"Are you absolutely sure that it is hopeless?" asked the specialist.

Crathern was surprised. "Why, I understood so and I examined her eyes myself. If I had thought that there was a possible chance for her I should have taken her to a specialist as soon as she came to me."

"May I examine her eyes? There are many cases thought hopeless that are not so."

For a moment Crathern did not speak. Conflicting thoughts were racing through his brain. He turned to his friend.

"Arthur, Hope does not know I am deformed. I thought since she could not see there was no use to tell her. I trust I need not tell you that I want more than anything that she sees again if possible. But if she will be able to see I shall have to go away. I could not bear to have her look upon my body."

"Why, William, if she loves you she would not let that make a difference."

"But she might not be able to help it. You must promise me that if you can make her see again you will tell her of my deformity as soon as the bandage is removed, and also that I release her from her engagement.

Doctor Spencer laid his hand on his friend's shoulder. Of course I'll tell her if necessary, but——"

"That is all you need to say. Thank you. Now we will go to her and you can make your examination."

Hope gladly submitted herself to Doctor Spencer and answered all his questions. All she knew of her blindness was that it had come gradually about five years before she came to live with Doctor Crathern.

"Were you in good health at the time?"

"No, I was in poor health. There wasn't anything special the matter, but I was weak and pale. It was not having proper food and air, I suppose."

After making a very careful examination of the young girl's eyes, Doctor Spencer motioned Crathern from the room.

"I haven't a doubt that she can be cured completely and by a very simple operation. We will not tell her of our high hopes, however, for something unexpected might happen."

Doctor Crathern's face paled but his voice was firm as he said, "Do your very best and telegraph me the result. I shall leave to-night—that is, if you will operate to-morrow."

"Yes, to-morrow. But don't you think——"

"I must go," said Crathern emphatically. "I could not bear to run the risk of having her see me."

Doctor Spencer's persuasions were of no avail and his friend left town early the next morning. Hope asked for him but was told he was called away and could not be present at the operation.

In itself the operation amounted to very little, but afterward great care had to be taken. Hope was so patient and obedient that at the end of a week the bandage could be removed from her eyes in a darkened room.

"Oh, Doctor Spencer, I can see," she whispered, almost afraid to breathe. "Won't Doctor Crathern come soon to share my joy?"

"My dear child," began the doctor gently, "there is something Doctor Crathern asked me to tell you. Like you, he has had an affliction for many years. In fact, he has had it from birth. He is badly deformed. That is why he has gone away. He could not bear to have your eyes see his misshapen body. He asked me to tell you this and that he released you from the engagement."

"But I don't want to be released," cried Hope. "Oh, Doctor Spencer, send for him quickly, for he must be suffering terribly. Telegraph him to come back or I shall wish I could not see. Sign my name, please."

In his barren hotel room where he was waiting, torn by his love for the girl and his desire for her full recovery, Doctor Crathern received the telegram.

"Come at once or I shall wish I could not see. Hope."

The crippled man threw himself upon the bed and did not try to check the sobs that shook his whole body. Hope could see and she still wanted him. That seemed to be the only important thing in the whole world.

As soon as he could get a train home the doctor returned. In the library he found his friend waiting with a beaming face. "Come," he said, "she is longing for you," and took him to the door of Hope's room.

Crathern turned to his friend. "Perhaps she does not realize——"

"Go in and see for yourself."

Crathern opened the door and went in alone. "Hope," he said, without approaching her, "Hope, look at me. I am misshapen and ugly. Look at me."

Hope looked, then held out her arms, a wonderful light in her eyes.

In a moment Crathern was kneeling at her feet and her arms were tight around him.

"I saw you, dear, before I saw your body. Nothing can alter that. I would not give you up for the most perfectly built man in the world."

Crathern could not speak but only clung closer to her.

MEXICAN REVOLUTION AND AUTO MISHAP STIR UP BUCK CONNORS

Buck Connors, of the Frontier Brand, continues to sustain his reputation as a "busy feller" by doubling in Mexican revolutions and auto accidents. On July 13, Buck, Deputy U. S. Marshal Moore, Carl Widen, cameraman of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, and three El Pasoans, went out to the camp of the Constitutionalist commander, General Ortega, near Guadaloupe, Chihuahua, Mexico, to take pictures of the revolutionists. They obtained some splendid films of Ortega and his staff, and his military preparations, and were returning to the border at a thirty mile a minute clip when their touring car skidded on some obstruction in the road near Fabens, and turned turtle.

The jolt temporarily stunned Buck and his companions, but when an inventory was taken they found that no one was seriously hurt. As if by a miracle, the precious negatives and the camera were unharmed and the party improved the opportunity to take another picture of the wreck. The film negatives were developed when the party reached the frontier and the pictures of the revolutionists are being shown in El Paso.

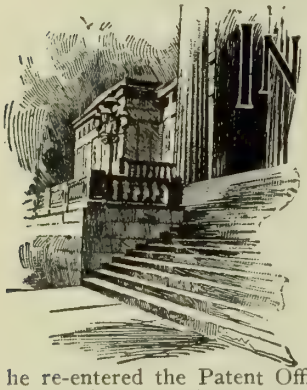
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

IN THE PATENT OFFICE



THE new assistant commissioner, Robert T. Frazier, like his chief, Commissioner Ewing, he has had the benefit of long experience both within and before the Patent Office and in the courts. He entered the Patent Office as fourth assistant examiner in 1887, and served in the various grades until his resignation in 1893, at which time he was a first assistant and about to be promoted to principal examiner. After seventeen years of active practice before the department he re-entered the Patent Office again as fourth assistant examiner in September, 1910, since which time he has passed through the intermediate grades, being again promoted last November to the position of first assistant examiner, from which position he steps into the assistant commissionership over the heads of all the principal examiners, board of examiners in chief, etc., which would indicate his possession of exceptional qualifications and experience for this important executive and judicial position. The fact that both the chief and his assistant have had extended practice before the office in the interests of inventors and manufacturers ought to insure a fair, impartial and liberal administration, and counteract the tendency within the office to unduly obstruct the issue of patents,—a tendency arising largely from personal equation and one-sided experience, as an examiner is virtually "a law unto himself," and hence ability to see and understand both sides of a question is essential to an equitable exercise of his judicial discretion. Mr. Frazier is fifty years old, a native of Tennessee, and graduated from the United States Naval Academy in 1883.

"Pathéscope" Willard Beach Cook, of New York, N. Y., has applied for registration of accompanying word combination as a trade-mark for machines for the production of moving pictures, stereopticons, magic lanterns and motion picture projecting and accessories and supplies therefor, used since May 12, 1913.

Patent No. 1,066,766 relates to means for producing the picture-carrying member of a lantern slide of a composite character, designed to be used in connection with a screen member for producing motion picture effects. Fig. 1 is a sectional view of the device, and Fig. 2 a diagram illustrating the process. In the diagram, suppose B to represent the sensitized plate, and C, C^1, C^2 the screen member in three different positions in relation to said plate. When the screen and sensitized plate are in the position C, withdrawal of the slide 12 will result in an exposure of the sensitized plate to the objective through the clear spaces 1, these exposed portions being indicated on the Plate B by the horizontal lines at 1a, all the other portions of the sensitized plate, however, being covered or protected by the opaque lines of the screen. Now, by shifting the screen to the right in relation to the sensitized plate to the position C^1, exposure of the plate at the points 2a will take place through the clear spaces 1, and the previously exposed portions of the sensitized plate at 1a, together with the remaining unexposed portions at 3a, will be covered and protected by the opaque lines of the screen. By shifting the screen member to the right in relation to the surface of the sensitized plate to the position shown at C^2, the portions 3a of the plate will be exposed while the portions 1a and 2a will be covered. By thus taking a number of pictures of the same object or person, and changing the pose between exposures, a composite picture will be produced which, when used in combination with a screen like that described for taking the pictures, the different sections of the composite picture will be brought to view in succession for securing moving picture effects, and by using a transparent sensitized plate and a transparent screen member having the opaque and clear lines, a slide may be formed suitable for projecting the images on a screen by a lantern such as used in moving picture shows. Alexander S. Spiegel, of Chicago, Ill., is the inventor.

May number of the Technische Monatshefte (Berlin) gives an account of an optical telegraph invented by a deaf and dumb married couple. The device consists of a keyboard, as in a typewriter, through whose keys single electric currents pass. In each circuit is included an incandescent lamp with a flat surface, bearing a letter of the alphabet or a Roman numeral. Pressing any key causes the corresponding lamp to glow. Thus words and sentences are spelled out and numbers are formed. The keybord can be operated as fast as that of an ordinary typewriter, so that with practice communication becomes very smooth and rapid. Each station, of course, must contain both a sender and a receiver and these may be in different rooms or in houses a long distance apart. The instrument can be conveniently used for conversation between a deaf person and a normal person who is ignorant of the finger-language. The silence with which the device is operated is a very important point in its favor. This feature might make it especially useful where quiet or secrecy in transmitting information is desirable, as in sending war news or secret instructions in business houses.

Mobile pictures are being used by horseshoe manufacturers to teach how horses should be shod.

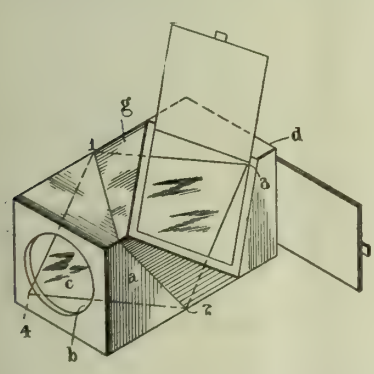
One essential object in the coloring of photographs is to so color the photographic layers that the color will be fast and will not fade or deteriorate by lapse of time. It is, for instance, of very great advantage to have a fast color when colored photographic films are used in display machines as these films are subjected to a strong light and the coloring matter is thus liable to be attacked. Alfred M. Sandig, of Chicago, Ill., in his patent No. 1,067,198, seeks by a new process to attain this desired permanence as well as a toughening of the photographic layer, which is of particular importance in kinetoscopic films, where the emulsion layer is subjected to bending stresses and to abrasion. The gist of the invention consists in the use of vat dyes (or similar coal tar derivatives) which change color by oxidization. For instance, if Ciba blue 2B were used which produced a yellow solution in the vat, the materials on which the solution acted would turn to a blue color after exposure to the atmosphere. The color change effected is permanent, will not fade, and the photographic emulsion layer is toughened.

The specific claim is for the process of treating photographs which comprises impregnating the emulsion layer of a photograph with a solution comprising a readily oxidizable vat dye, an alkali and a hydrosulfite, rinsing the photograph, and developing the dye color by an oxidizing treatment.

According to the Optical Journal and Review irregular ocular movements that are not otherwise perceptible may be detected and recorded by means of the kinetoscope. A small, bright light, positioned at a suitable distance forms a small image on the corona of the eye. As the eye attempts to follow the curve of the test object (say a circle) the camera takes a rapid succession of views of the eye and its bright spot. Then a comparison of the resulting prints and the position of the bright spot in each shows the movement of the eyeball in following the circle. In this manner it is proven that the movement of the eye is not regular, the gaze passing from point to point until the complete image of the circle is formed. In other words the eye does not "swing around the circle," it jumps intermittently around it, a la golf.

A BY-PRODUCT of the erection of Machinery Hall, the largest of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Buildings, will be a mobile picture film that in less than ten minutes will reproduce the whole laborious task. A cinematograph camera, operated by clockwork, and protected from the sun and wind has been set to take a snap shot of the building operations every five minutes during the continuance of the work. When the pictures are reproduced the reel will be run off at the rate of 864 pictures a minute, the equivalent of more than a week's work, so that only eight minutes will be required for showing the pictures representing three months of construction work; and yet they say "Rome was not built in a day."

An invention in color photography is the subject of Patent No. 1,066,526, issued to Otto Pfenninger, of Brighton, England, and relates more particularly to cameras for obtaining a plurality of negatives at one exposure, in which an inclined colored transparent plate is inserted in the path of the rays from the lens, and reflects certain color components of the rays onto suitably placed sensitive media, and transmits the remainder on to a further sensitive medium. According to this invention, the reflecting element instead of being inclined to the longitudinal axis, and to one of the transverse axes of the apparatus only, is inclined to the other transverse axis as well, whereby it appears from experimental investigation that the distortion of the image produced by the transmitted and therefore refracted rays in the known type of camera referred to, and which it has been proposed to overcome by the use of an additional inclined plate either correcting the distortion, or producing a like distortion of the images produced by reflection, is overcome or rendered negligible, while at the same time the number of surfaces liable to lead to internal reflection is reduced to a minimum. Careful experiments which have been made show that provided care is taken to correct for the diminution in size and bodily displacement of the transmitted image (which is obtainable by focusing and suitable cross motion of the back plate carrier), there can readily be obtained by this camera three negatives corresponding to the different color components which are to the eye capable of perfect registration, and from which color prints of greatly improved quality can be obtained. The accompanying perspective view shows a camera embodying the invention. The camera box a has a lens opening b, and a reflector c a suitable photographic plate being disposed at d, in an extension g provided for the two other plates which can be placed in the usual way in the extremity thereof. The reflector c, is placed so as to be inclined to the longitudinal, and both transverse axes of the camera, it being so disposed that the line 1-2 is perpendicular to the longitudinal axis of the camera, and the line 3-4 is inclined at an angle of 45 degrees thereto. The axis of the extension g, in order that the reflected rays may impinge correctly upon the plate it carries, is inclined at equal angles to the slides from which the extension is built out. The above principle of construction may be utilized in cameras in which a plurality of reflectors is employed.



MOBILE color pictures are wonderful enough in their way but now represent past achievement in the art. Among the results that inventors are striving to attain now are, mobile stereoscopic pictures; continuous instead of intermittent film projection; and mobile pictures by telegraphy.

Mobile stereoscopic pictures are now, practically, an assured fact in the near future, and will obviate the flat photographic appearance on the screen, give depth of background, and vastly increase the illusion. The continuous image, also imminent, will eliminate flickering and jerky action. But the telegraphic proposition is still in the laboratories.

However, continuous image, stereoscopic, colored, talking mobile pictures are foreordained and next in order.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

SING SING CONVICTS WELL TREATED, SAYS RELIANCE FEATURE

According to "The Fight for Right," written by the Prison Reform agitator, James Oppenheim, for the Reliance feature release of August 9th, the prisoners at Sing Sing are treated like millionaires compared with the treatment received by prisoners in other states, where he claims that prison contract labor not only makes conditions much worse, but also gives the labor unions a legitimate ground for complaint.

"The Fight for Right," which was staged by Oscar C. Apfel, called for the obtaining of much inside information regarding conditions in different prisons as well as the taking of actual scenes in and about a large penitentiary. Owing to these facts and the importance of the subject treated, the picture is said to be of more than ordinary interest.

A MIDSUMMER ADVERTISING STUNT

Always to the fore with advertising novelties for Motion Picture Theatres, the Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Company, Arthur D. Jacobs, president and general manager, 30 Union Square, New York, have recently gotten out what they term "Photoplayer Fans" which for this time of the year, there can certainly be no more useful or appropriate souvenir to give away to moving picture patrons during the months of July, August and September. The fans are printed on two sides, on one side the exhibitor is allowed to choose the picture of any one of the two hundred and fifty different photoplay artists, male or female, appearing in either association, Mutual or Universal films. On the other side of the fan is the advertisement of the theatre giving them out as souvenirs. These fans are sold in 500 lots at $6.50 or 1,000 lots for $11.50, practically about one cent apiece, so any manager playing to either a five or ten cent admission can easily afford to give them away, keeping his audience cool and comfortable during the summer months and as these fans are sure to be carried away by your patrons to their homes and seen by their friends and acquaintances, it means a lasting advertisement for the theatre. All orders accompanied by the necessary remittance should be addressed to Dept. N., the above concern, to receive prompt and careful attention.

CURRENT COMMENT

Screen Realism

In the motion picture the actors are called upon to face, not mere technique—hairbreadth escapes and rescues which the audience know are feigned, but the actual crises of life. This is one reason why the movies have driven off the stage the old-fashioned melodrama. In the outdoor scenes they actually do the things that are shown on the screen; they ride the horse, run the automobile, row the boat. In bitter winter weather the actor leaps into the ocean and drags to shore the drowning heroine; or some young girl descends by rope ladder from the fifth story of a tenement; or in the battle scene soldiers fall from their charging horses and lie on the ground, trusting the other riders not to trample them. Surely this takes courage. This is not melodrama in the old sense, not merely acting; it is life itself, one of those rare crises that call out the unusual courage of a heroine.—American Magazine.

Oklahoma City in Movies

Oklahoma City got into the movies last week with several thousand feet of film, contrasting the situation of twenty years ago and that of to-day, by showing the observer how a frontier has been transformed into a thriving city. The pictures will be shown in Oklahoma City for a week, then reeled onto convas throughout the United States for 300 nights.

The pictures were taken July 24th, 25th, 26th and 27th, and were in two parts. The first deals with Oklahoma City in 1889 when it was an army depot, and shows features of the opening, the race for claims, staking them off, boundary disputes, and all the trimmings of the incidents in those days.

Part two of the picture bridges the twenty years by showing Oklahoma City as of to-day. Last Sunday pictures were taken of the churches, and the church-goers en route to worship.

Placed in the picture there is a good view of a corn field, to show the agricultural development, and a section of Oklahoma City's famous speedway, with a string of automobiles.

Film Used by Gas Company

In order to show the people of Cleveland the progress of the new twenty-inch pipe line being run from West Virginia to bring an additional supply of natural gas here, the East Ohio Gas Co. has prepared 1,500 feet of moving picture film portraying the development of the construction work.

The line is 152 miles in length and will cost about $2,000,000. It will furnish gas at the rate of 50,000,000 feet per day in addition to the present supply from one ten-inch and two eighteen-inch mains from the same gas field.

The film shows the drilling of the gas well, surveying and fixing the location of the line, the making of couplings to join the sections of mains, transferring the pipe from narrow gauge railway to four-team wagons and distributing it along the line, and the digging by machinery of trenches and lowering of the pipe.

Each length of pipe weighs one ton, taking twenty-four men to lift it into position. Through the mountainous country of the southern end, great difficulty was encountered in distributing the pipe, the men having to drag it over hills and teams haul it through creek beds.

The line is expected to be completed by September 15th and in operation by October 1st at the latest.

The film has been shown at the following theatres: Alhambra, July 21-22; Olympia, 23-24; Globe, 25-26; Mall, 28-29; Bijou Dream, 30-31; Gordon Square, August 1-2. —Plaindealer, Cleveland, O.

Films Reveal Track Perils

Moving pictures are being used by the Chicago and Northwestern railway to warn the public against the danger of trespassing on railroad tracks. In every city and town on its right of way films are furnished free by the company to moving picture owners for the purpose of demonstrating the hazard incident to walking on the right of way of a railroad.

A statement issued by R. C. Richards, chairman of the central safety committee of the company, discloses that within the last twenty years 86,733 trespassers were killed and 94,646 trespassers injured on railway lines in the United States. The statistics compiled by Mr. Richards show that 25,000 persons under eighteen years of age were among those either killed or injured during the period mentioned. Others who lost their lives or were injured as a result of trespassing included 36,275 tramps and 120,103 individuals who are classified as wage earners.

"Laws should be enacted which would stop this slaughter," says Mr. Richards. "It would cost the public less to enforce such laws than it does to pick up and bury the dead; also to care for cripples."

The pictures are now being shown in Rochester and will, no doubt, be seen in Mankato in the very near future.—Review, Mankato, Minn.

Film Favorites

Do not think for a moment, either that the inspiration of the audience is wholly lacking. Not only are there the trade papers and theatrical journals which regularly criticize the films, and praise or damn the actors; but if you were a moving picture fan (there are twenty million fans in this country alone) you would know what fame comes to the actors. Ask the first department store girl you meet just who her idol is, and she will promptly say: "Costello." Who is Costello? He is the handsome man of the Vitagraph Company. Ask the office boy here about his favorite comic actor, "Bunny," he will say; Bunny, whose amazing face has penetrated farther in this wilderness of earth than Pear's soap. And doubtless the poor woman who comes in for a day's scrubbing could tell off quickly such names as Mary Fuller, Marc McDermott, Florence Turner, Rose Tapley, Ruth Stonehouse and "Broncho Billy" Anderson.—American Magazine.

Big Business in Buffalo

The entire moving picture business in Buffalo is estimated at being worth $2,000,000. That includes all the "movie" houses in the city and the exchanges. Of course much more than that has been invested in the business since its origin here.

In the moving picture business in Buffalo there are about 1,000 persons employed, including cashiers, operators, ushers, ticket takers, singers and pianists.

The first official count ever made in the United States has been given out by statisticians in New York City and it shows that 6,380,000,000 nickels, or $319,000,000, paid by 3,600,000 spectators, has been spent to see motion pictures during the past year.

It also shows that $8,000,000 is invested in the moving picture industry and that more than 200,000 persons are employed and that 10,000,000 feet of picture films are produced weekly.—Evening News, Buffalo, N. Y.

Columbus in Pictures

John Y. Bassell, manager of the Columbus, O., conventions and publicity bureau, has announced that he is now busily engaged in arranging for the preparation of a series of films that will make attractive presentation of the industrial life and activity of Columbus through the medium of moving pictures.

These it is his purpose to make exploitation of before the delegates—coming from all parts of the United States—attending conventions of a national character and meeting, from time to time, in various cities of the country.

Better Grade of Music for Picture Shows

Mrs. Balliet, chairman of music for the New Jersey Federation of Women's Clubs, recently had a conference with Mr. Edison and the National Film Co., in regard to having a higher grade of music at moving picture shows. Mrs. Balliet urges that national hymns and the old songs like "Annie Laurie" and "Ben Bolt" be used at the "movies" instead of the cheap, lurid songs of the day so that children may gain some initial appreciation of music that can be commended for its sentiment.

OPERATORS' CHAT

The next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will be on Monday, August 4, 1913, at 12 p.m., at the meeting rooms, Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street.

* * * *

The outlook for the moonlight excursion up the Hudson River, to be given by the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, is very encouraging and it will, no doubt, have a record-breaking crowd. The boat will be at the foot of East Twenty-fourth street on Saturday evening, August 2, 1913, at 8 p.m. Dancing begins at 9 p.m.; music by Fisher's Band. Boat leaves dock at 12 p.m. and 1 a.m., allowing all operators time to make the boat.

Now you operators who are not members of any organization, and have been sitting on the fence to see which way things would go, are realizing your mistake by not joining when you had the chance at the low entrance fee, and during the past week the writer has heard many stories of the "whys," "ifs" and "ands" from at least twenty-five operators who desired to enroll and were refused as the books are closed until further notice.

Arguments, excuses, recriminations and even tears flowed when the applicants were told they were too late. You have only yourself to blame, Mr. Operator. You had over eleven months' time to come into the fold.

* * * *

To all Union men one of the most important obligations is to look for the Union label, and not spend your money with those who are opposed to organized labor. Patronize the firms who carry Union label goods and employ Union labor.

Operators—have your repairing done by Union men.

Printing matter is not Union unless it bears the Union label of the Allied Printing Trades Council.

Look for this cut on all printed matter that you read or handle. The label is on the Moving Picture News.

BE CONSISTENT

Look for the Union Label

Look for the Label—purchase with care
Only such goods as you know to be fair—
Be it cigars, suit of clothes, shoes or hat,
Spend no Union-made cash to help fatten some rat;
Toilers' actions speak louder than words, it is said,
Even though they are printed in ink that is red;
Rouse up, Union men, on the label insist—
Since injunctions but swell the "don't patronize" list.

GEORGE KLEINE TO RELEASE NEW BRAND OF FILM

George Kleine, the big Chicago film importer, announces that in the future another make of film will be released by him in America. This is the production of the Celio Company of Rome, Italy, a new corporation whose releases have never before been seen in America. Mr. Kleine was so impressed with what he saw of the new company before he left Europe that contracts were made to release the Celio Company's pictures regularly in this country.

Beginning Tuesday, August 12th, George Kleine will release a two-reel feature every Tuesday. "Mong Fu Tong," the title of the first release, is a sensational story of a band of Chinese thieves and their dissolution by an American cowboy employed for the purpose. The addition of the two-reel every Tuesday is the result of a steady demand from theatres and exchanges for more Kleine multiple reel subjects.

Boise, Idaho.—The old store building at 819 Main street is soon to be the home of a moving picture show. The building is being remodeled and will be opened by Herman Kaiser.

THE GREATER LOVE

Itala

The danger of promising to marry a man when impelled by the impulse of pity is well worked out in the Itala Film "The Greater Love." The girl loves the other man. However, she renounces her own hopes of happiness to bring solace to him who lies wounded at the foot of the forest oak, laid low by the poacher's gun.

This marriage, however, would not work out in life and it is not accomplished on the screen. Strangely this is done through the instrumentality of the wounded man who, learning that the girl had sacrificed herself for him, takes his life or rather allows his wounds to take it. As he lies swathed in bandages, he sees through the open door the girl and the doctor. The girl is telling the doctor of her promise to wed his patient if he should recover. Their actions are unmistakably those of lovers and the wounded man, disinclined to accept artificial affections, elects to cast his lot in spirit land.

There are some good rousing moments—the chase scene in which the owner of the estate and his party, on horseback, dash through the bush and splash through the river shallows in the stern pursuit of the poacher whose traps and their animal contents lead to his detection; the ambush incident where the poacher at bay, hateful, vindictive, that he should be hunted with the same relentlessness that he, the poacher, hunts game, turns his shot gun on the pursuers and "lets her go." A good story, "The Greater Love," and the directors wasted few feet of film in starting the action and keeping it going.

VITAGRAPH

THE PENALTIES OF REPUTATION (Aug. 7).—Ned Lawlor, an incorrigible flirt, is invited to spend his vacation with Charlie Maybury and his wife, Laura. They also invite Mary Fleming, an old school friend of Laura's, but tell her of Ned's well known tendencies. Mary replies that she considers herself a match for the worst flirt in creation.

Ned and Mary get along famously together, each of them flirting most outrageously with the other. Before he knows what has happened to him, Ned finds that he has really fallen in love with Laura and makes still more ardent protestations to her of his undying devotion. Laura finds that she is falling in love with Ned and resolves to get away in order to save herself future pain. She writes to her mother, asking her to send a telegram calling her home, as she does not wish to appear voluntarily to retire from the field.

Ned, who has already secured Laura's photograph, asks her for one of her pretty curls. She will not allow him to cut one from her head, but tells him that she will give him what he wants the next time they meet. In her bedroom Laura cuts a curl from a false cluster and gives it to Ned, who is quite satisfied with it.

The telegram arrives calling Laura home and she goes to bid everyone good-bye. She is very indignant with Ned, who had tried to kiss her the day before, and decides not to see him alone. An accident throws her into his society and she sees the way in which he treasures the curl and the photograph. Realizing that he truly loves her, Laura tells him of her little deception and offers to let him take one of her real curls. Instead of a curl, Ned takes the girl into his arms and receives her sweet confession of love. Mr. and Mrs. Maybury are about the most surprised people in the world when they hear the news of the engagement.

LUBIN

INTO THE LIGHT (Aug. 12).—Kate Hardy is a beautiful young girl; she works in a department store for small wages and lives with her married sister. Kate dislikes her poor and sordid surroundings and determines she will not marry Dave Horton, who is little or no better off than herself. She loves Dave, but does not wish to struggle with circumstances and be poor all of her life. One day she is introduced to a young magazine illustrator, who is looking for types for magazine pictures. Hayward is struck with the girl's beauty and tries to induce her to become his model for which she will be well paid. The picture of luxury on one side and love in a cottage on the other makes her very undecided, but she finally decides to accept the lure of the studio. Just as she is preparing to leave home her sister has a bad fall and Kate returns to aid her. She then sees the love and terrible anxiety of Annie's husband and like a flash she realizes how love can compensate for all adverse conditions. She goes to Dave and poor as she is, they walk into the light together.

SOLAX

FOUR FOOLS AND A MAID (Aug. 13).—Mary has four ardent suitors—John, Dick, Tony and Oscar. They all call on the same evening. John comes first, bringing candy. When Dick arrives, Mary conceals John, making him into a hall tree with the aid of coat, scarf, hat, etc. Dick has just time to eat some of John's candy before Tony arrives. Against his will, Dick is made into a table, while Tony serves as a reclining chair, when Oscar arrives. Oscar sits down on Tony, Tony jumps up, he and Oscar tumble onto Dick, the three bump into John.

In the meanwhile Mary has received a telegram from an old sweetheart making an appointment at the minister's house to get married and while our four friends are awaiitng her return we see the marriage performed. When she returns with her husband our four fools kick themselves with disgust.

A DROP OF BLOOD (Aug. 15).—Bristol Inn is a tavern in a small Western mining town. It is a lonesome and uninviting place, and as strangers rarely pass through the town, business is very poor. Brown, the innkeeper, and his wife live at the inn, together with Homeless Mary, a maid of all work. A beggar one day comes to the door and, being refused charity, motions to Brown that he has a letter for him. Brown takes the letter, reads it, and is apparently delighted. He orders wine and cake to be served and, after the beggar departs, shows the letter to his wife, which reads.

"Dear Brown:—

"A gentleman will call at your inn for lodging at about eight o'clock to-night. He carries much money and jewelry with him, which perhaps we can land.

"Yours truly, John Lane."

Mrs. Brown also appears pleased, and together they go upstairs to make preparations. While they are thus employed, Mary, the maid, receives a clandestine visit from her lover, John. She soon sends him off, however, fearing a scolding. As he is about to leave, Brown and his wife come downstairs and Mary is forced to hide John in a small closet. The Browns send Mary to the next town on an errand to get her out of the way. At about eight o'clock Graham, the expected lodger, arrives. He does not seem very well pleased with the inn, but decides to make the best of it. He eats a little supper, and being very tired decides to retire. As he is about to leave, Mrs. Brown throws a quilt over Graham's head, while Brown himself stabs and instantly kills him.

Meanwhile John, in the closet, has been waiting for an opportunity to escape, and upon finding that everyone has gone upstairs, decides to leave. Reaching the foot of the stairs on his way to the door, he is startled by a strange sound from above. He stops to listen and, while doing so, a large drop of blood falls on his hand. He is frightened and runs out to the brook. While running, he is seen by a cowboy and a trapper. The next morning the cowboy happens to be passing the inn and finds Brown and his wife at the door talking very excitedly about the murder. He explains to them that he saw John the night before going towards the brook. At this moment the trapper comes along and confirms the cowboy's statement. John is arrested, tried and convicted. However, visions of the murder constantly bother both Brown and his wife, and very soon remorse overcomes them, and they confess.

FRONTIER

THE RETRIBUTION OF YSOBEL (Aug. 16).—Baldwin is a hot headed youngster. If he were not there would be no story to tell about him, but for all his hot headedness he loves Ethel a great deal. When at last she allows him to place a ring upon her finger he is very proud. His pride is touched though by the fact that the ring is a little too large and he offers to take it to a jeweler to have it cut down, but Ethel wants to show it to her friends at the party that evening and she keeps it on.

Not long after Baldwin has gone to his home, Ethel's cousin, a merry and good hearted chap, returns from a trip abroad. As he leaves the house to go downtown and meet his friends once more, Ethel rushes out to tell him goodbye. In the hearty handshake that follows, Ethel's ring is drawn off accidentally. The cousin urges that she let him take it down to the jeweler and get it fixed. After some urging Ethel agrees, but to get the right size she tries on one of the cousin's rings. One is found after several trials that is the right size and he leaves, agreeing to have it made that dimension.

That night at the party the cousin returns Ethel's own ring, but it is not quite right yet. She again tries on his ring and while she is doing it he improves the opportunity to steal a kiss. Baldwin sees them and so great is his anger that explanations can do no good when he finds the cousin's ring where his own ought to be. His faith in womankind is crushed and he leaves that place forever. The West is naturally the part of the country to which he turns.

In due time he arrives in the West, buys a horse and saddle and gets work on a ranch. The ranch owner, a woman, is responsible for his employment and this gains him the enmity of the ranch foreman, a Mexican named Gonzales. Later Baldwin protects a girl, formerly a waitress at a saloon, from abuse at the hands of Gonzales. The ranch owner discharges the Mexican and six months later gives the place to Baldwin who by that time has fallen a victim to the coquettish wiles of Ysobel. Ysobel is known among the ranch folks as La Coqueta, and her coquetry aids in tangling the skein.

As she is returning from a trip to California, Ethel gets off the train at a little wayside station. Because she wants to be alone she orders her maid to remain at the train. A sprained ankle, subsequent fainting spell and a supply wagon from the ranch ultimately bring her to the place over which Baldwin presides. Meanwhile Baldwin has been trying his best to forget the East, an effort in which he is aided by his wife Ysobel. Ethel is shocked when she finds Baldwin married but there is no way in which she can leave the ranch that day and she stays perforce. Gonzales, the discharged foreman, sneaks back and leaves a note for Ysobel, warning her as she values her secret to be at the shelter on the range that night. The ranch woman takes Ethel out on the range for a drive, and when she becomes tired leaves her in Baldwin's care. Baldwin leaves her at the shelter with his revolver, telling her that a shot will recall him should he be needed. Ethel becomes worried and leaves the shelter. Gonzales and Ysobel make tryst there and Ysobel at harsh words from Gonzales shoots him. The shot recalls both Ethel and Baldwin. The girl thoroughly frightened fires again. She turns and as Baldwin enters, he finds her standing over the body of Gonzales, which she has just discovered.

Thinking she has killed the man he confesses to the cowboys on their arrival, that he is the guilty party.

Next morning everyone urges him to go away before the sheriff comes but he will not. The officer is about to make his arrest when an Indian arrives with news that puts a different complexion on things. This Indian had observed the quarrel of the night before and when Gonzales lay dying, stole from him the papers about which he was talking to Ysobel a moment before. He has been to a priest and had them translated and he bears word to the tragic little party at the ranch that Ysobel not only killed Gonzales at the shelter, but that she was his wife at the time. A certificate from the priest bears witness to this fact.

The way is thus cleared for Baldwin to rectify his former mistake and attain happiness, while Ysobel has at last come upon the retribution of his coquettishness.

POOR JAKE'S DEMISE (Aug. 16).—Jake surprises his wife and a "Willy Mollycoddle" making love in his own home. He is so enraged at his wife's frailty and "Mollycoddle's" duplicity, that he promptly throws the latter through the window. The Dude picks himself up from the ground and haughtily walks away, while Jake rebukes his repentant wife and leaves the house, swearing to commit suicide, to end his wrecked, unhappy existence.

The wife, fearing that he may carry out his resolve, telephones to police headquarters. The sergeant gallantly responds to her appeal and sends out his three "trusted" cops in search of Jake.

Meanwhile, Jake decides to reflect at the "bar" before his final deed. During frequent drinks he discovers Mollycoddle, who also has sought to drown his sorrows. He is immediately recognized by Jake, who by the aid of a seltzer bottle, makes things suggestively more pleasant for the ardent lover on the outside than within the jealous husband's range.

Jake, having temporarily prolonged his attempt at suicide, wobbles in an intoxicated condition from the saloon and becomes entangled in a park fountain, where he is set upon by ruffians and relieved of his valuables. The police unexpectedly fall upon the unconscious form of Jake and carry him with ceremony of the dead to his home, where his wife, grief-stricken at his apparent self-destruction, proceeds to call upon the assistance of Mollycoddle. He willingly assists in the burial of the principal barrier of his heart's desire.

During the final preparations of Jake's rather hurried funeral, the mourners are suddenly surprised to find him sitting upright in their midst. Mollycoddle immediately makes a hurried and final exit from the house as Mr. and Mrs. Schultz, both repentant, go to fond embrace.

DARKFEATHER'S SACRIFICE (Aug. 11).—Darkfeather, a beautiful Indian girl, graduates from Hopi. She returns to her tribe, met by her father Ungatah, wearing the latest modern clothes. Kotah, an old admirer, shows his dislike for modern ideas by presenting her with a beautiful beaded leather dress. She assumes the garb of her tribe and again rides the prairies and forests.

Ned, a surveyor, rides from his camp one day and becomes lost in the desert. He is forced to abandon his dead horse, and is rescued from death by thirst, by Darkfeather. She takes him to the village and nurses him to health.

While drifting in a canoe one day during his convalescence, he tells her of his love. She accepts it, and on the bank he cuts two hearts in the bark of an old tree and carves their initials under them. Returning to the village, he openly declares his love for her by placing an engagement ring on her finger before the Indians. Later he leaves, promising to return. Kotah distrusts Ned, but says nothing.

Darkfeather, roaming over the old places, waits his coming, but when mail is brought to the camp and none for her, she becomes doubtful. Later, a party of surveyors pass through the village and stop to buy feed. Darkfeather questions Jim about Ned. He tells her Ned is married and shows her a newspaper containing a notice thereof.

Darkfeather, filled with anger and jealousy, at once assumes her civilian clothes and goes to the city, learning Ned's whereabouts through an old envelope he left in a discarded jacket. She finds Ned with his wife in the garden of their palatial home, and decides to strike them down. But love conquers her jealousy and she leaves quietly. Ned, hearing her in the bushes, rushes after her. She refuses to speak to him and leaves with no sign of recognition.

Returning to the village, she discards her civilian dress and carries all relics of civilization in a bundle to the trysting tree of the hearts and initials. Here she casts the bundle of clothing into a huge fire which consumes them as well as the tree, and returns to her tribe.

THE GREAT TOWEL ROBBERY (Aug. 15).—A traveling comedy company has finished its engagement in a small country town and is leaving the hotel in an automobile for the next town. After their departure, the chambermaid finds several towels missing and informs the proprietor. He telephones the sheriff of the loss, and the latter, accompanied by four deputies, starts in pursuit of the comedy company on bicycles.

The automobile in which the troupe are traveling gets stuck in the country road. The members of the company refuse to walk, and the manager secures the services of a nearby farmer to haul the troupe in his wagon.

Arrived at the scene of the accident, the company and baggage are loaded into the wagon, but the farmer is so busy watching the soubrette that he upsets the whole troupe in the road and they have to walk to the farmhouse.

In the meantime, the sheriff, after many mishaps, catches up with the troupe, who are lodged in the farmhouse. The deputies are concealed outside the barn while the sheriff goes to the house to reconnoiter. He meets the farmer, who invites him to have a drink of hard cider, and in partaking of this seductive fluid, they forget all else.

The troupe is being fed in the front yard of the farm, and the farmer's son, a tough kid, is carrying on a flirtation with the soubrette, which leads to many amusing incidents and accidents.

At last the sheriff remembers what he was sent for, and calling the waiting deputies, he placed the troupe under arrest, while they are still at dinner.

The wife of the hotel proprietor comes into the hotel office and is told of the loss of the towels. She demurely produces them from her bustle. The proprietor sends a messenger after the sheriff, and he arrives there just as the arrest is being made.

Relieved from suspicion of the robbery, the troupe takes revenge on the sheriff and deputies by pelting them with eggs, food, etc.

HOW WOMEN LOVE (Aug. 12).—Alice Howard, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Colonel Howard, a wealthy retired planter, falls in love with Henry Carleton, her music teacher. Henry tells the proud Colonel of his love for Alice and is forbidden to enter the house. The young couple elope and are married; they take up housekeeping in the city and after trying to gain the parental blessing, which is refused, they gradually drift away from Alice's family altogether. Things go fairly well with the young couple for a while when Carleton is suddenly taken ill and is forced to take to his bed. He continues to be sick until his entire savings have been exhausted. Meanwhile the Colonel, Alice's father, has his troubles trying to comfort his wife, who grieves over Alice's forced absence from her home. Alice, insanely in love with Carleton, determines to seek and get employment so as to earn enough at least to sustain life in Carleton and herself, until such time as her husband recovers from his illness and is able to resume his own work. She walks the streets from one place to another for days at a time, until finally she obtains employment in a sweatshop, sewing garments on a machine. Her hours are tiresome, but she does not mind them so long as she is earning a living for herself and the man she loves and with whom she has cast her lot and given up her palatial and influential home. One day, the foreman of the shop, attracted by her rare beauty, attempts to kiss her and she slaps his face. She is discharged. She looks for work elsewhere, and the landlady of their flat threatens to dispossess them unless the rent which is past due is paid. Carleton, desperate, though still ill, gets up out of bed, and himself goes out trying to find something to do, whereby he can earn some money. He is overcome while on the street and a crowd is attracted. Among them is Jackson, the Colonel's faithful old colored butler, who is visiting the city with the Colonel. He recognizes Carleton, and assists him home. He gives the landlady, who has again become insistent, her money, then gets the Colonel and brings him to the house. There the old gentleman, realizing the depth of Alice's love, and what she has gone through, takes them both to his heart, and makes them come home with him, there to stay and gladden his and his wife's hearts.

SALLY SCRAGGS, HOUSEMAID (Aug. 14).—Doris Lowrey, a famous novelist, in order to get material for her new novel—"Sally Scraggs, Housemaid"—leaves her home of luxury and, impersonating a housemaid, seeks and secures a position as such in a typical boarding house.

Her desire to discover "characters" meets with instant success. Part of her arduous duties is to wait on table where congregate a varied assortment of boarders. Possessing a pretty face and attractive personality, which her effort to conceal by "acting" fails to cover, she is made the recipient of bold advances on the part of a young clerk. Frank Norcoss, a poor, struggling author, gallantly protects her, thus engendering a friendship that develops into a feeling of deeper sentiment.

Doris is astonished to discover while cleaning Frank's room, that he too is a novelist. A cursory examination reveals a literary talent that she realizes is but temporarily unrecognized. As their friendship ripens she continues her masquerading and has many opportunities to display her liking for him by according him personal favors that cannot but be appreciated.

His finished novel is submitted to one of the foremost publishing houses. And then comes a letter not only telling of acceptance, but advancing royalties. Norcoss is in a predicament on account of his shoes being worn past repair, and it is Doris who prevails upon him to accept as a loan one of her rings which is to be pawned for sufficient money to purchase a new pair.

Elated with his unlooked-for success, Norcoss forgets for the moment the apparently poor girl who has been so much to him. The months slip by and Norcoss is being dined and feted by the elite, and meanwhile the girl, hurt by his negligence, throws aside her desire to further seek characters and returns home where she finishes her novel, which strange to say meets with equal success in being accepted and published prior to other works.

Norcoss in going over his papers one day discovers a valentine that the housemaid had given him, inside also being the long forgotten pawn tickets. His negligence and ingratitude causes to burst into flame the tender sentiment of his struggling days. He searches days and days to discover her whereabouts, having learned that she left the boarding house shortly after he vacated.

His "Personal" is seen in the paper by "the girl" wherein he asks that she communicate with him, as his conscience condemns him. Actuated by a desire to perhaps discipline him for his negligence, and also to reveal her true self, she phones him and makes an appointment.

Norcoss, realizing that she is far more to him now than ever, keeps the appointment and meets her, she having hunted up the old dress to make him think she occupies the same position as when he knew her. He shows his sincerity of purpose, which robs her of a desire to discipline, yet prompts her to fool him, as he returns the ring and asks for her hand. She pretends anger and dismisses him. Hurt beyond words, yet realizing the folly is his, he returns to his library to think of what "might have been."

She meanwhile discards the old dress, and gowned in stylish garments she hastens to his home. Her card is given to the disconsolate Norcross, who sits gazing at the valentine. She has followed the valet, however, and sees him tear the card and refuse to see her. The valet is enjoined to remain silent, then "Sally Scraggs" steals up to Norcoss, silently slips into his view the title page of her own book, and stands waiting.

Dazed momentarily by the revelation of her true identity and the realization that she has come in answer to his most sincere desire, he staggers to his feet. . . . And the time of lingering doubt ends.

THE THIRST FOR GOLD (Aug. 13).—A criminal, whose stolen wealth brings him nothing but imprisonment, and a prison surgeon, who willingly barters his soul for that same elusive wealth, are the two dominant figures in this drama. A dissecting room, an attempted murder, a heroic rescue, a court-martial, a search for the baleful gold, a sudden catastrophe whereby the Good Samaritans of the story come into possession of the coveted wealth, crowd these two reels with thrills that keep one on edge with excitement all the way through.

The action takes place during the Civil War period—'61 to '65. Fredericks, an army surgeon, was detailed to the Suffolk Penitentiary, where military rule awaited the appointment of civil authorities. On being invited by Surgeon Cadwalader, a young comrade, to attend the Governor's ball, Fredericks upbraided him bitterly, saying that his poverty barely left him apparel for ordinary occasions.

In a nearby field Helen and her sweetheart, George, were helping the Widow Drury spread her linen for bleaching, when Helen slipped and sprained her ankle. George ran for assistance and encountered Surgeon Fredericks on horseback. The surgeon directed George to carry Helen home, and followed in surly fashion. Nor would he treat the suffering girl until her mother had parted with gold, a locket and chain, in payment. Then he advised cold compresses as he roughly wrenched the ankle and left—the simple farm folk gazing after the heartless surgeon in astonishment.

That night, while Surgeon Fredericks slept drunkenly, the Sisters of Mercy in the prison saw Convict No. 220 faint for lack of medical aid. Fredericks finally aroused himself, pronounced the man dead after a cursory examination, and ordered him removed to the dissecting room. In brutal mood he prepared for immediate work on the corpse, and was about to plunge his knife into it, when the supposedly dead man rose up, threw back his arms and bespoke his protection—for a price. When Surgeon Fredericks had recovered his composure he learned that Convict 220 had feigned death in order to attempt escape, for the purpose of recovering the stolen wealth which had caused his imprisonment. The plan to its hiding place was tattooed on 220's arm, and he was willing to share the booty with the surgeon, if he would aid him to escape. Fredericks agreed. Fetching the prisoner's civilian clothing, he led him outside the penitentiary and down the steep, barely passable cliffs on which it was built. Shortly after dawn they had reached a point where the prisoner would have to be lowered by a rope. He trustingly dropped. Fredericks waited until the man was within a hundred feet of the river below; then one blow of his axe severed the stout rope and sent his victim hurtling into the water. Fredericks breathed deeply—the gold was now all his—and turned back toward the penitentiary. To escape before official inquiry should disclose Convict 220's disappearance he wrote himself a letter, supposedly received from a defunct uncle, in which he was named as the heir to comfortable estates. Armed with this, he appeared before the Colonel in command, only to learn that he was charged with mistaking catalepsy for death, thereby enabling a prisoner to escape; for which he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

Convict 220 had not been drowned, for George Trueworth, rowing across the river, saw his terrific fall and rescued him, taking him to the Widow Drury's home, that she might aid the poor wretch. One month later Fredericks was freed, and upon unanimous vote during a session of court-martial, dishonorably discharged. He left early, begrudging every moment that stood between him and the hiding place of his victim's wealth. After some search he located the place, and his feverish digging uncovered the box Convict 220 had described. Convict 220, recovered after a month of faithful nursing, had also come in search of his wealth, wherewith to reward the widow and her family. As the convict faced the man who had attempted his murder, Fredericks reeled, then attacked the phantom with his axe, felling it. Not stopping to wonder at finding Convict 220 a reality, Fredericks aimed a blow at the box, when Convict 220 begged him to hold back a moment. Fredericks struck him again, struck the box a heavy blow, and fell across his victim, a victim himself to the explosive which Convict 220 had placed in the box to defeat other finders than himself.

Helen and George, making love in a nearby field, heard the explosion and came to learn its cause. They found the two men covered with a shroud of gold. George buried them, and carried the gold home to the widow. She would not touch it, until George showed her the letter accompanying it, giving it to the first honest people who might discover it.

SOLDIERS THREE (Two Reel) (Aug. 16).—Ned, Frank and Bill are friends. There is a call for volunteers for the Civil War. Frank and Bill enlist but Ned delays, as he is the only support of a sick mother, who has just had a relapse. This is unknown to the villagers, and they believe Ned to be a coward. At last the mother improves sufficiently for Ned to enlist. They start for the front, and Dora, the girl that both Ned and Frank love, promises to wed the one who returns with the highest rank.

At their first battle Frank deserts in action, while Ned proves himself a hero by saving the flag and his captain's life, but just as he gets the unconscious captain to safety, he faints. Frank sees him from the shelter of a tree and creeps out. He drags Ned back behind the tree and himself picks up the flag and his captain and goes to camp, where he is received as a hero by officers and men alike and promised to be mentioned for promotion, which he later receives.

As he turns to go, Bill, who had been hiding behind another tree, confronts him, telling Frank that he had seen all. Bill promises to remain silent if Frank will use his influence for him. This he does, and the three boys return home after the war—Frank and Bill with commissions, but Ned still in the ranks.

True to her promise, Dora marries Frank and moves to a nearby town where, after a year's time, she has become thoroughly disillusioned—her fortune nearly all spent and forced to stand both neglect and abuse. She overhears a quarrel between Bill and Frank on account of the former demanding more money and learns that it was Ned who was the real hero.

She leaves to go to a friend in her home town but Frank overtakes her and drives her to a sanitarium, telling the doctor in charge of the hospital and sanitarium that the death of her father has unbalanced her mind.

He then tells Bill that he will not only outfit him for a mining trip but also accompany him. They set out, but their first night in the desert Frank gets up stealthily, takes the water and supplies and is just riding away to leave Bill to die when Bill awakens and fires at him. Frank hurries to the hospital while Ned and his mother, who have sold their cottage and started across the desert to make a new home, hear Bill's cries, go to him and take him to the hospital. Bill and Frank die, after Bill has confessed, and Ned and Dora are left to pick up the tangled threads of their romance.

MATING (Two Reel) Aug. 11).—The story relates to life in the primitive ages when might was right, when romance played very little part in the mating of man and woman. "Pretty One" had ripened to blushing girlhood, and as she saw the simple smile of youth fade into the beauties of womanhood, she felt enraptured.

"Little Man," who had become bewitched by the charms of "Pretty One," wooed her and brought her gifts of game and skins. She accepted his pleasantries and his gifts, but coquettishly refused to become his mate. "Great One" had often admired "Pretty One," and as he sees "Little Man" and "Pretty One" in the woodland, he rushes upon them and ruthlessly tosses "Little Man" aside, who slinks away muttering threats of dire vengeance, yet realizing that he cannot match his strength against "Great One."

Smiling at the torrent of rage of "Little Man" he lifts "Pretty One" in his arms and carries her to his cave. "Pretty One," submissive to the strong domineering demeanor of "Great One," becomes his mate.

The scene changes to modern times and the three personalities present themselves in the form of a woman tremendously impressed by the strength and brawn of a common sewer digger and loved by a man of culture and wealth. The laborer uses the primitive methods of "Great One" and so strongly impresses the woman with his strength that he almost wins her.

But might no longer is right, and the modern woman asserting her right to mate with whom she pleases, accepts the "Little Man," leaving the "Great One" to ponder at the great change in social conditions of the world since the primitive period.

THE HEART OF A JEWESS (Two Reel) (Aug. 15).—Abraham Lieberman is a coal and ice dealer on the lower East Side, his little business being conducted in a miserable basement—his living rooms being adjacent thereto.

But Abraham is happy withal, for his daughter Rebecca has come to him from Russia.

A month later Rebecca is working in a "sweat shop" to help keep their little home. Here she meets David Cohen, foreman of the place, who falls in love with her. But she tells him he has no chance to win her heart, as it is held in keeping across the seas.

A month later her sweetheart arrives from Russia, and David, the poor rejected lover, leaves New York broken-hearted, to seek his fortunes elsewhere. Meanwhile Jake has become Americanized and desires to take up the study of medicine, but has not sufficient means to enter college.

Rebecca comes to his aid and her little savings enable him to take up his course. In due time he graduates and he hangs up his "shingle," but his patients are poor and so his living is precarious.

At this juncture along comes a "Schatchen," a Jewish matchmaker, and offers to get him a rich wife. The girl in question is very homely, but her rich surroundings dazzle Jake and he succumbs. Thus is Rebecca thrown over for Mammom, and her heart is broken.

A few months later the "happy" bridal pair and their friends start for the synagogue. On their way their machine runs down a poor girl who has just come from a drug store with medicine for her sick father. The girl is Rebecca. She is taken to the hospital where, in deep repentance, her recalcitrant lover begs her forgiveness. In the synagogue, meanwhile, the homely bride awaits the coming of Jake, but her father rushes in and tells of his base desertion.

Back at the hospital Rebecca, regaining consciousness, repudiates Jake and tells him to go to his waiting bride. Paying the penalty of his transgression, he dejectedly goes forth, but deeper humiliation is to follow.

Arriving at the synagogue, he is met by an infuriated woman who spurns him and casts him off, leaving him to the mercy of her friends, who beat and maltreat him, as he well deserves.

Months later David, the foreman, returns and, learning of Rebecca's dilemma, seeks her out and again pleads for her love. Rebecca accepts him and happiness at last comes to the Jewish girl.

The doctor promises to do so, but arrives at the bank too late, so has to take the money home with him. He leaves the house and also the money. After he has gone, the tramps force their way into the house. Mrs. Reed with Ruth goes into the doctor's office and barricades the door then calls up her husband on the phone. He manages to get part of the message and understands her danger, but his patient's life is at stake and he cannot leave him. Meanwhile the tramps have forced the door. Mrs. Reed gets an idea and putting Ruth through the window with the money, tells her to go for help. She is unable to escape herself as the tramps seize her and threaten her while they search for the money. Ruth soon finds help and the rescuing party soon arrives. The doctor has restored his patient and as the immediate danger is passed he hastens home arriving just in time to help subdue the tramps. Ruth shows she still has the money and as the doctor's wife is not much hurt, the doctor is rewarded by the consciousness of having done his duty as a man and a doctor.

THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT (Two Reel) (Aug. 9).—John Ward, a young workman, loves Mary Durland, daughter of a rich politician who installs prison contract labor in the prisons of his city. The other knitting mills in the town cannot compete with cheap prison labor and are forced to close down. John and his brother Joe, are thrown out of work and with others of the men go to see Durland who refuses to listen to them. John and Joe vainly look for work. Their mother is ill and needs nourishing food and medicine and they have no money. Joe, an impulsive warm-hearted lad decides that as Durland took their living away he shall pay and he goes to his office intending to rob it of enough to carry his mother through her illness. Durland returns for some papers and the boy is caught. He is sent to prison and works on the knitting machines. He breaks down under the strain and is brutally treated by the guards and is later transferred to the road-making gang. Unaccustomed to this he faints continually, but never meets the slightest kindness or consideration. Mary Durland returns home from boarding school and meets John who is now a mechanic. She sees the difference in him and asks what is wrong. He does not tell her the truth, not wishing her to know her father is the cause of his trouble. John becomes a labor leader and makes up his mind to fight the prison contract labor system. Mary, who has become interested in sociological works, discovers the truth about the prisons when she finds Joe physically and almost mentally a wreck. To convince herself further she goes through the prisons as well as the hospitals. She goes up North and studies prison conditions there. She finds men learning trades and working for the State not in competition with labor. Returning home she calls on John to come and see her and to him she tells what she saw while away, announcing her intention of fighting the prison contract system. John then tells her she will be fighting her own father, but nothing daunted she goes right ahead. Mary and John appear before the legislature just as the bill is about to be refused prohibiting prison labor. They have Joe with them, helpless and almost a cripple, and Mary makes an impassioned speech recommending the bill. She so interests the men that they rise and one and all vote for the bill. Durland feeling himself beaten consents to his daughter's marriage with John and for her sake promises to help the cause along.

THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY (Aug. 8).—Danton passed a millinery shop, saw a pretty hat and bought it for his fiancee. Inez wore it—and then all sorts of mysterious things began to happen. Wrerever Inez went money and jewelry were roughly crowded into her pockets. The police were helpless. And then suddenly, Inez disappeared. Danton grew desperate and sought out Henry Sterret, a famous detective, who agreed to undertake the case.

Sterret soon solved some of the mystery of that dainty bit of headgear. Madeline, his assistant, purchased one and immediately became the recipient of monies and jewelry. What happened to her and Sterret, the thrilling rescue of Inez from The House of Mystery, makes a film that for absorbing story, dramatic situations, spectacular effects and convincing acting, is the vast exception among multiple reel subjects.

KING ROBERT OF SICILY (Aug. 4).—Part I. Robert, King of Sicily, a proud and haughty monarch, scoffs at the church and proudly declares there is no power that can remove him from the throne. One evening, while at vespers in the church, Robert falls asleep. Afraid to awaken him, the attendants steal away at the end of the service. Robert sleeps soundly far into the night, and awakens to find only a few candles flickering on the massive altar. Gazing with astonishment around him, Robert suddenly discovers that he is clothed in the rags of a beggar. Rage gaining possession of him, he escapes from the church and rushes to the Palace throne room. Here he finds an angelic King seated upon the throne, wearing his robes, his crown, and signet ring. Wild with fury Robert denounces the Angel as an imposter, and is thrown into a dismal dungeon. Later he is visited by the Angel, who again asks if he is still the King. Proudly Robert answers in the affirmative, and is further punished by being transformed into the Court Jester. The Angel slowly fades from sight, and Robert finds himself with nothing but an ape for counsel. In the great banquet hall Robert is ridiculed by the pages when found eating scraps of food from the plates after the guests have gone. Still his pride dominates and his haughty answer, "I am—I am the King!" saddens the Angel, who realizes the task is not yet finished. As Holy Week approaches, the Ambassadors from Pope Urban summon the Angel King to Rome. At last Robert sees a way to dethrone the impostor, for is not the Pope his own brother? Surely he will right the great wrong that has been done. So they depart o'er land and sea, into the lovely land of Italy.

Part II. Upon arriving in Rome the Pope receives them with great pomp on St. Peter's Square, but Robert's hopes are dashed to earth when, after an impassioned appeal to his own brother, he finds the Pope knows him not, and jests with the Angel saying, "It is strange sport to keep a madman at court." Seizing the furious Robert the guards imprison him in a cell. Easter Sunday gleams upon the sky and Robert, rising from his pallet, eagerly watches the people as they enter the church for early mass. Suddenly a celestial gleam of light falls upon his upturned face and, feeling within a power unfelt before, he kneels humbly and for the first time lifts his voice in prayer. Holy Week ending, the Angel King returns once more to Sicily. Now it is that Robert seems to feel the angelic presence of the impostor King, and humbles himself for the first time. Later, in the great throne room, Robert, still in his jester garb, gazes from the open casement and is aroused from his reverie by the sound of the vesper bells and the chanting of the monks nearby. Watching him closely, the Angel King dismisses the court and, appearing before Robert, once more asks "Art thou the King?" For a moment Robert hesitates, then crosses his hands meekly upon his breast and makes answer "Thou knowest best." At this acknowledgment of his lowliness, the Angel reveals himself to the King and slowly fades from view with a last blessing. Discovering that he is once more clothed in his regal robes, King Robert impulsively goes alone to the church and there, kneeling before the holy altar, he silently prays, while a shaft of heavenly light breaks over the lofty crucifix and falls upon his humbled head.

PATHE FRERES

PATHE'S WEEKLY (Aug. 5).

THE LOVE LETTER (Aug. 5).—Max, while on one of his usual gumshoes for excitement, pays rather marked attention to the occupants of a certain house where a lady of exquisite beauty has been noted by his eagle eye. One day she hands him a note, but the wind catches it before he has a chance to read it and leads him to one hundred and one queer outlandish places and many adventures. Ultimately he captures the note but finds that it is in Sanscrit. After tremendous efforts he finds a place where such things are translated and learns much to his chagrin all the lady has to say. What's in the note is too good to tell. Better see the film and see for yourself.

AUSABLE CHASM, Grand Canyon of New York (Aug. 6).—This scenic film carries the spectator through the most picturesque spot in the Empire State. Ausable Chasm is a great cleft in the mountains through which tumbles a torrent of foaming water, leaping from rock to rock on its restless journey to the sea. We see "Elephant's Head," "Table Rock," "Post Office," "The Flume" and many other points of beauty.

On the same reel.

IN SAMOA.—A study of the modes and customs of the natives in this island, which is interesting and highly instructive. The native villages, the shops and streets, the curious dances of the men and women, the expert swimming and diving of youngsters 7 and 8 years old, and the great strides in civilization made by these people are all shown.

WHEN A WOMAN WASTES (Aug. 7).—The beautiful Mrs. Langford has the fault of being a very great spendthrift. Frequent remonstrances from her husband cause her finally to pawn her necklace, the gift of Langford's mother. An unscrupulous admirer learns of the fact, secures the necklace and expects by this means to have a hold on Mrs. Langford. A series of dramatic incidents follow in rapid succession, ending in the discrediting of the villain and the final reinstatement of Mrs. Langford in the affections of her husband.

GENOA, the Principal Port of Italy (Aug. 8).—A remarkably interesting series of views of the city to which America is so greatly indebted. Here Columbus was born and spent his boyhood days. The ancient village is renowned for its port from which for centuries Italian ships of commerce have left. Ancient buildings, historic ruins, many edifices of great architectural beauty and the busy marts of trade are all faithfully shown in this film, which ends with a magnificent moonlight picture of the harbor.

On the same reel.

MOUNT ST. MICHEL.—Mount St. Michel is a rocky promontory in the Bay of St. Michel on the coast of France. It is joined to the mainland by a dike, built within comparatively recent years. On the summit of the Mount is a Benedictine Abbey, one of the most remarkable monuments of French military and monastic architecture in existence.

A WOMAN'S WAY (Aug. 9).—A young broker loses all his money and all his wife's money, and as a result his wife leaves home and returns to her father, and the husband, after vainly trying to see her for many months, goes West. His wife gets a divorce and marries another. One day wife and former husband meet and he tries to persuade her (little knowing of her second marriage) to return West with him. She, though she loves him, loves money more and sticks to her second husband. This film is full of dramatic situations and many pathetic moments mark the story as one of intense interest to everyone.

PILOT

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (Aug. 7).—After the honeymoon the Newlyweds rent a house and start housekeeping. Mrs. Newlywed loves her husband devotedly but at times and on the slightest provocation becomes jealous of her hubby. Unfortunately the picture of a chum of Newlywed's sister finds its way into his effects and is found by Mrs. Newlywed in helping her spouse to unpack his things. A storm is averted, but the seed is sown. Mrs. Newlywed has a desire to own a horse and Newlywed plans to surprise her with one as a Christmas present. By an unfortunate coincidence the horse he has selected for his wife bears the same name as his sister's chum, and Mrs. Newlywed finding some of the correspondence referring to the horse, jumps to the conclusion that the Bess referred to in the letter is the same as the Bess in the picture and becomes a victim of the green-eyed monster, thinking her husband is deceiving her. Circumstantial evidence accumulates and she consults a lawyer regarding a divorce, taking with her the letters she has filched and the photo of the supposed destroyer of her happiness. The lawyer she consults proves to be the husband of the Bess in the picture and the "green-eyed monster" finds another victim in the man of law and letters.

He rushes from his office, determined to secure satisfaction, if not an explanation, from the villain who has wrecked his home, leaving Mrs. Newlywed to await his return. The explanation is forthcoming and the lawyer admits the drinks are "on him." A meeting is then arranged between Mrs. Newlywed and "Bess" and the course of true love resumes its peaceful way again.

to the charms of a sweet country maid. Then the rich woman realizes that she loves him. She goes to the country, hoping to rekindle the old flame in his bosom; but too late; for love triumphs and he prefers his little country bride to the rich woman, who thought to play with his affections.

SHOULD WOMEN WORK?—Mr. Proudfoot is suddenly convinced of the fact that there are many, many women in the world working very hard for a living, and he decides that henceforth he will never let a woman work. He goes out and assists every female he meets, but returns later in a different frame of mind, having made up his mind that the answer to the question is YES!

EDISON

HIS GREATEST VICTORY (Aug. 8).—Jane Doone has told Lieut. John Blake that she will marry him, and a reception is held by the girl's relatives to announce the happy event. In the midst of the merrymaking a soldier suddenly enters with dispatches ordering Blake to the front.

A hasty wedding is performed between Blake and Jane, immediately after which Blake, accompanied by Crane, who has acted as his best man, departs for the war.

In his first engagement, Blake behaves like a hero and saves the colors from the enemy. He is severely wounded in the course of the fight and left for dead on the battlefield. When he regains consciousness, he gives his coat to one of his comrades and picks up a canteen on which the name of John Stokes is printed, thinking it to be his own. He then drags himself to a sentry outpost. After a six weeks' struggle between life and death in the hospital, he at length emerges sound in body, but with his mind a perfect blank with regard to every detail in his past life.

The canteen bearing the name of John Stokes seems to him to be the most plausible clue to his own identity, and he re-enlists under that name.

Meanwhile, the name of Lieut. John Blake has been reported among the missing after the battle. To Jane Doone, the first poignant sorrow of her loss is gradually softened and mellowed by the hand of time.

Two years later the war is over. Crane, now a colonel, is an ardent suitor for Jane's hand. She at last consents and journeys out to the army post of which Crane is in command.

Blake, still bearing the name of John Stokes, is one of a detachment of soldiers which arrives at the post shortly before Jane.

Crane recognizes him and, like the officer and gentleman that he is, and although it means sacrificing himself, succeeds in clearing Blake's muddled brain by bringing up old recollections. Thus the long separated husband and wife are reunited.

No opportunities for strong dramatic action have been overlooked in the staging of this exciting play of love, war and sacrifice.

GREAT NORTHERN

A SHOT IN THE DARK (Aug. 2).—This dramatic offering has an appealing touch and in it are seen Miss Thomson and Mr. Psilander in roles which are entirely suited to their personalities. And in order that honors may be fairly divided "Little Sunbeam" Frederickson, of the Great Northern staff, has been assigned to an important part and plays it with her accustomed chic and intelligence. According to the story depicted on the screen, Johnson, a young solicitor, meets a former sweetheart during the absence of his wife and baby girl on a vacation trip. Upon the return of the latter, Eva, the wife grows suspicious because of her husband's conduct and gains from him a confession of his wrongding. Eva leaves him and with Jane, an old servant, and little Dorothy, makes her abode elsewhere.

The child is overtaken by illness and old Jane hastens to the father to notify him. It is agreed between them that he shall make a secret visit to his former home at eleven o'clock at night. While kneeling at the bedside of his baby the mother is aroused and, hearing a sound in the sickroom, supposes that a burglar has entered the house. The shot that she fires in the dark at the intruder results in a superficial wound and is the means of bringing about a reconciliation. The play is well acted and is a most interesting offering.

ITALA

THE WAR CORRESPONDENTS.—Bretton, furnished with credentials to Balkan officers, obtains a personal letter from the Minister of War, charging his subordinates to give the young newspaperman every assistance. On the train Bretton meets Clark, correspondent of a rival newspaper. While passing through the customs, Clark catches sight of Bretton's letters of recommendation. Not having any himself, he resolves to steal them.

The story jumps to the scene of warfare where Sonia and her father are tending their sheep. The old man is killed by a stray bullet and is buried by his mourning daughter.

The two correspondents proceed on foot to headquarters and notice, from the edge of a precipice, a skirmish between the contending forces. In order to more clearly observe the fight, Bretton throws down his knapsack. Approaching too near the edge, he makes a false step and falls. His cries are heard by Sonia, who, in going to his rescue, risks her life. Clark cuts open his rival's knapsack and steals the coveted papers. Bearing these he goes to headquarters, where he is warmly received.

Bretton recovers from his fall and is somewhat smitten by his rescuer. Found by the soldiers, without credentials, he is arrested as a spy. He escapes from the guard tent and gallops away on a horse, untouched by the sentry's pursuing bullets.

A battle is in progress and both correspondents have their stories ready. Clark, tricked by Sonia, is detained in his attempt to reach the telegraph office and so Bretton's telegram goes through. When Clark finally arrives the wires are congested. Disgruntled, he visits a neighboring theatre, but the enemy are within range and a well-directed shell crashes through the building and sends the audience and performers fleeing for their lives. Clark, among others, is rendered unconscious.

Bretton hearing of an impending battle on the sea, journeys there and, by climbing a tree, sees the demolition of a majestic war vessel by a hidden mine. Again the correspondents hasten to the telegraph office and Sonia, aiding Bretton, again foils Clark.

Bretton, to obtain a better view of a land conflict, goes aloft in an aeroplane. It is shattered by a shell and falls earthward with a sickening crash. Sonia, who has been captured by the Turks after being wounded, has escaped from a hospital mosque and is wandering around when she sees the aeroplane descend. She saves Bretton from being burned to death. Again Bretton is triumphant in getting his story over the wires ahead of Clark. He asks Sonia to return home with him as his wife.

The young people on the conclusion of hostilities arrive in Bretton's home town and are congratulated warmly on their work by the newspaper proprietors. Bretton and Sonia meet Clark, their former enemy, and all differences are ended in a warm handshake and the declaration that "all is fair in war and love."

There is a rapid succession of big and thrilling scenes. A bridge is exploded and the train plunges through the opening into the river. There is much burning of gunpowder, a theatre is destroyed by a bursting shell, and there are the active manoeuvres of artillery, cavalry and foot soldiers.

KINEMACOLOR NEWS

Edward Frieberger, lecturer-at-large on Kinemacolor pictures, who has been touring the Chautauqua circuits with great success this summer, finds the audiences not only appreciative but anxious for more. Many wait after the show to ask questions, and some "speak out in meetin'." During the solemn Coronation scene a little boy piped up with the query: "Mister, why does the King wear that fur rug?"

During the Durbar scene, a lady sent up a request that Mr. Freiberger "make the elephants go slower," explaining that her daughter was an art student who wanted to sketch some of the designs on the state robes.

THE GREEN GOD

Union Features—Released August 6

Jealousy forms the theme of this three-reel feature. Marie Jannus, a flower-girl, makes her living by selling flowers in the fashionable but gay restaurants of Paris. Her fiance, Pierre Sandri, is a violinist at Maxim's and has been made a lot of by the after-theatre crowds. On this eventful evening the flower-girl, in selling her flowers among the diners, meets Baron Desroches, an elderly man of great wealth, who, taken with her beauty, makes advances, but is rebuffed by her. He then plans to win her.

He attends Maxim's with Gaby Derilly, a Parisian beauty of note, where they dine. Sandri wanders around until he comes to their table, and plays to Gaby, who flirts with him and proceeds to carry out the Baron's plans by ensnaring him in her net. Gaby Derilly gives a reception and begs Sandri to play. He goes, and Gaby uses her physical charm and beauty to captivate him. In a moment of passion he kisses her hand, and is seen by the flower-girl, who creates a scene, and Sandri renounces her. She turns to leave and meets the Baron, who offers to escort her, which she accepts.

They go to his hotel, where she is dressed by the maid in the latest fashion. She sends a farewell note to her mother and then goes to dinner with the Baron. He attempts to kiss her, but she beholds a vision of her Sandri and frees herself and runs to her mother's rooms. Sandri, anxious about her, calls to see her mother in the meantime to explain his actions and that he still loves her daughter. Marie is overjoyed at learning this and goes to his home the next day to see him. She discovers Gaby outside the door of his room, and is so enraged that she strikes her in the face with her hand. Gaby flees.

Marie is again seen at Maxim's selling flowers and approaches a couple, who purchase some flowers. The man, a friend of the Baron's, slips a purse in a pocket of Marie's, and she goes on her way selling her wares. Suddenly there is a commotion, and Marie is sent for. The purse is found on her and she is arrested and sent to a reformatory. Her term expired, she seeks justice. She again takes up her previous occupation of selling flowers and one evening overhears a conversation carried on between her accusers, and learns how her misfortune was planned by Gaby. She then goes home and dons boys' clothes and goes to the home of Gaby, seeking revenge. While hidden there she sees a burglar creeping from under Gaby's bed and about to choke Gaby, who is removing her jewels at her dressing-table, takes aim and fires. The bullet, which she first intended for Gaby, finds its mark in the thief, who proceeds to make his escape, but is intercepted by Marie. They struggle, but she is overpowered and he gets away.

Marie is taken to the hospital, where she is visited by Gaby. Marie forgives Gaby, who brings about the reunion of Sandri and the flower-girl. A tribute is sent to them by Gaby in the way of a floral piece, and Jealousy is at last vanquished.

The Green God is full of strong scenes and is well acted by a capable cast. The photography is excellent, as is characteristic of all French films.

FAMOUS PLAYERS' REGULAR RELEASES

An announcement is made by the Famous Players' Film Company to the effect that beginning September 1st it will inaugurate a policy of regular releases of three, four or five-reel features. These productions will be issued three times a month, their length to be determined by the particular requirements of each subject. This monthly program will be as important as the former releases of this company, and will conform entirely with the high standard established and maintained by this company.

This extended policy was formulated as a direct effect of the unanimous demand for more frequent and regular releases of the Famous Players' product, and is virtually an acknowledgment of the wide and general endorsement of the company's activities, and a favorable acquiescence to the repeated requests of exhibitors and state-right buyers throughout the country.

For several months past the Famous Players' Film Company has been planning to increase the volume of its output, but withheld announcements of its purpose until all necessary preparations were completed. Quietly but constantly it has been at work gathering a promising number of prominent stars and acquiring the rights to successful plays and popular novels, until now it has developed an organization including the most brilliant array of stars and possessing a most impressive selection of subjects for presentation in motion pictures.

To-day, with the amalgamation of motion picture and theatrical interests steadily increasing, this monthly program of the Famous Players assumes far reaching proportions. When the detailed plans of its widened scope are fully revealed, they will be found to contain the answer to a very perplexing and recurrent question in film circles, the growing demand for more serious and reputable subjects as against the stereotyped average of the present offerings.

Among the first few productions to be released under this new plan are Mrs. Fiske in her famous success, Thomas Hardy's pathetic story, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," the film production of which has already attracted such wide attention in the daily newspapers throughout the country; Miss Mary Pickford in the favorite novel and play, "In the Bishop's Carriage"; Henry E. Dixey in "Chelsea 7750"; Lillie Langtry in a tense, dramatic play, "His Neighbor's Wife," described as a powerful sermon in film, and Laura Sawyer in "An Hour Before Dawn," a female detective play.

The Famous Players movement has been effective in raising the standard of motion pictures to a higher and more dignified plane. Its activities have been of a significantly helpful nature to the entire industry, and have been immeasurably instrumental in attaching a greater prestige to the motion picture. These activities are bound to reflect their importance on the history and progress of the trade.

THE TRUE FEATURE COMPANY

The True Feature Company, a new feature corporation incorporated under the laws of New York has opened offices on the seventh floor of the World's Tower Building, 110-112 West Fortieth street, where it will distribute the output of the Continental Kunst Film Society of Berlin. The product of this company has a world-wide reputation, it has a magnificent studio, the best talent of Europe, a corps of modern, progressive and daring directors and unlimited capital. Their feature output will average two per week. The first release will be "The Doom of Darkness," a four-reel tragedy of tremendous power, wholly original in plot and directed by F. Burkart, for many years the director of the Irving Place Theatre, in this city. Mr. Burkart takes the leading part in the play. The True Feature Company has now on hand a large supply of excellent features averaging about three reels in length. None of them have ever been shown here. Following the style of the London market the company has installed a roomy and comfortable projection room in its offices and buyers can see what they want when they want without any more delay than putting the reel in the magazine.

GAUMONT SEMI-AMERICAN FEATURE

The Gaumont Company announce something new for that firm—a semi-American feature "Money's Merciless Might," to be released on August 15th. This is a story of modern life and conditions in America, portraying an American millionaire whose creed is that his millions will purchase anything he sets his heart upon—even the girl he covets. The machinations of the money-king in his successful endeavors to get rid of the other suitors are characteristic of the merciless autocrats under whose powerful sway the people sometimes groan. The scene is laid partly in America but mainly in the lovely country of the Riviera, and this new three-reel feature is a triumph of photography.

Tom Evans has instituted a delightful custom at his Hollywood studios. The pictures are shown from a building onto a screen erected under the trees in the garden. Benches are provided and the people congregate of an evening and enjoy their projection. It is amusing to hear Baby Early criticise her own work; she keeps the audience in a constant smile. "Huh, I don't think I did that very well," "my, didn't I make a funny face then," and so on.

The Tom Evans will be known as the "Venus" films and, apart from their excellent direction and the acting, they will surely be known by reason of the excellence of the photography. Both Stephen S. Norton, who cranks for Mr. Matthews and Harry Gant, who holds down the camera end for Mr. Macdonald, are forever striving after new effects and getting them, too. Mr. Gant is quite a character in his way. He was a cowboy and looks it. He first worked in the pictures with the Edison Company and his chief asset was his ability to fall off a horse without dislocating his neck. He used to fool around the camera a lot and before he knew where he was he turned the crank one day when the regular was sick. After leaving the Edison people he joined the Powers forces.

Every Simplex user is a Simplex booster.

The reason is a simple one. Simplex projectors eliminate all your machine troubles and increase your gate receipts.

What more could you expect of a machine?

All the good points you look for and many you never thought of before you will find in the Simplex.

Dear Sirs:—

I have one of your Simplex machines installed in our Royal Theatre, and am more than pleased with the results obtained with it. It has been in constant use for over a year and we have not had to replace one single part in this time. Every little screw and the smallest wearing parts are in perfect condition.

When I was in Kansas City over a year ago, I looked the Simplex over carefully and I was a little timid about buying one of these machines, but I took my time and looked the machine over critically and being a judge of good projection machines, I finally decided to put one Simplex machine in our theatre in place of a ————, which was practically new.

THE DIFFERENCE IN THE RESULTS OBTAINED WAS WONDERFUL. EVEN MY PATRONS NOTICED THE DIFFERENCE THE VERY FIRST TIME THAT WE USED THIS MACHINE. We have had no trouble whatever with this machine that was due to faulty construction and I am willing to wager that this machine will outlast any machine built, and from its present condition I am sure that as long as I live this same machine will still be in use.

Respectfully yours,

Herbert Thacher, Manager Royal Theatre.

is a recognized fact. It is the result of many years' labor and research of the inventor, Mr. Nicholas Power, who for years has been recognized as an authority in the moving picture machine business.

It is the last word in moving picture machine development. It possesses every up-to-date improvement. Its vital features—the LOOP SETTER, the INTERMITTENT MOVEMENT—are exclusive.

The acknowledged perfect projection of the Cameragraph can be maintained only by the use of genuine parts manufactured at our factory. They are of the finest degree of accuracy. Made of best material and guaranteed by us. Avoid spurious parts.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS CALL MEETING AND PERFECT NEW ORGANIZATION TO BE AFFILIATED WITH THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Name of New Organization Will Be The Motion Picture Exhibitors Board of Trade of New York State, Inc. State Conventioo to Be Held at Syracuse, Monday, August 11th

We present to our readers the report of the meeting called to organize the New York exhibitors which was held at 141-143-145 East Houston street, New York, on Tuesday, August 5th.

The meeting was called to order at 12:30 with Mr. John Mullaney temporary chairman and Mr. F. E. Samuels temporary secretary.

The following letter dated July 29th addressed to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York and the following report of the arbitration committee appointed by Samuel H. Trigger and L. F. Blumenthal were read:

Motion Picture Exhibitors' Assn. of Greater New York,
136 Third avenue, City.

Gentlemen:—Enclosed please find a copy of the report of the committee on arbitration that was appointed to represent both of our organizations at the meeting held at the Union Square Hotel yesterday.

We are sending this to you so that you may present it in its correct form at the meeting which you are calling for the purpose of taking up this matter.

We would deem it a favor if you will advise us of the action taken by your body not later than Monday, August 3d, as it is the wish of our committee to act in this matter at the earliest possible moment.

The nominating committee as appointed by Mr. Blumenthal are as follows: Ed. Valensi, L. Germain, John E. Mullaney, Jay L. Wolf. The fifth member to be chosen by the committee.

This committee will not convene until we have been notified of the action taken by your association.

Yours truly,
FRANK E SAMUELS, Temporary Secy.

Report of the arbitration committee appointed by Samuel H. Trigger and Louis F. Blumenthal:

This committee, after due consideration, recommend:

FIRST:—That we reorganize under the name of the MOTION PICTURE ASSOCIATION OF GREATER NEW YORK.

SECOND:—That we do not affiliate with any national or international body or movement for a period of one year and at the expiration of the year a two-thirds vote shall be required for us to become represented in any national or international body.

THIRD:—That the present board of officers be asked or requested to resign and shall not be eligible for any office for the period of one year.

FOURTH:—That our by-laws be so amended to read that no officer shall hold his or the same office for more than one year in succession.

After considerable debate, it was moved by Sidney Ascher and seconded by Mr. Marks that in view of the fact that our committee has been ignored and that up to the present time we have not received any answer either to the letter or the communication in reference to arbitration committees report.

BE IT RESOLVED, That we pay no further attention to the old organization and that we proceed to perfect a permanent organization. (Carried unanimously.)

Moved by Mr. Keppler and seconded by Mr. H. Jacobs that the organization shall be called the MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' BOARD OF TRADE OF NEW YORK STATE, INC., and that on all printed matter the following be inserted to the above:

LOCAL NUMBER 1 OF NEW YORK STATE BRANCH, NUMBER III OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA. (Carried unanimously.)

Nomination of officers being the next order of business the following were nominated and unanimously elected:

President, Mr. Sidney Ascher; first vice-president, Mr. John Mullaney; second vice-president, Mr. F. Goldfarb; treasurer, Mr. Harring; secretary, Mr. F. E. Samuels; financial secretary, Mr. H. Cleich; sergeant-at-arms, Mr. Levins; chairman board of directors, Mr. Harry Jacobs; vice-chairman board of directors, Mr. Jay L. Wolf; secretary board of directors, Mr. Felischman.

It was then regularly moved, seconded and carried that the same officers shall hold their offices after the incorporation of the association.

A rising vote of thanks was given to Mr. Mullaney for the manner in which he conducted his temporary office and Mr. Ascher proceeded to take the chair of president.

Mr. Keppler then sent for incorporation papers for the association and the following members paid their initiation fee and signed the incorporation papers.

Mr. Sidney Ascher, Mr. R. L. McNabb, Mr. John Mullaney, Mr. F. Goldfarb, Mr. A. Levin, Mr. Harry Jacobs, Harring and Blumenthal, Jay L. Wolf, F. & G. Amusement Company, F. E. Samuels, S. Marks, J. H. Lubin, Nathan Vinegrad, Cleich & Kronacher, Tobias Keppler and Mr. Carlos.

The president appointed the following chairmen of different committees, reserving them the right to select their own members of the different committees.

Mr. Carlos, temporary chairman of by-laws and permanent chairman of law and legislation.

Mr. Marks, chairman membership committee; Mr. McNabb, chairman financial committee; Mr. Lubin, chairman publicity committee. The president requested the different chairmen to take a little time in selecting their different committees as the possibility of other members in the near future will give them each a better chance to pick a good committee.

The matter of the state convention was then taken up and it was regularly moved, seconded and carried that Mr. Ascher and Mr. Clem Kerr, national organizer, leave as soon as possible for upstate to reorganize the state branch of the MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA.

The secretary was authorized to secure necessary books, letterheads, envelopes, etc., and that there shall be secured a stenographer for the office work, to be paid for by the association; also that HEADQUARTERS UNION SQUARE HOTEL be inserted upon all stationery.

There being no further business, the meeting was adjourned, subject to the call of the chair.

F. E. SAMUELS, Secretary.

In a telegram from Clem Kerr he states that he has secured a large convention hall at the Yates Hotel, Syracuse, for the state convention on Monday next. Sidney Ascher has wired the committee that members of the National body in Albany, Troy and Schenectady have all signified their intention to be with the organization.

M. P. E. LEAGUE OF AMERICA NOTES

Cleveland, Ohio, Local No. 1 will hold a meeting for the purpose of electing new officers on Wednesday, August 6th. Arrangements for a big meeting are being made by the Cleveland members to be held about the 13th or 14th, and they hope to have Mr. Neff stop off on his way home from New York.

A large number of letters are being received from Illinois, New York, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Indiana, expressing their loyalty to the M. P. E. L. of America.

RESOLVED, That the secretary of Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2, of the M. P. E. L. of America, be instructed to inform the national president of our league that Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 stands ready at any time to advance the league $500.00 to assist in carrying on the good work so efficiently and honestly being done by its officers.

A MIMIC RAILROAD WRECK

The Vitagraph Company Stages a Head-on Crash of Two Passenger Trains on the Raritan River Railroad

On the Raritan River Railroad, two miles out from South River, New Jersey, an unexpected head-on collision was pulled off by the Vitagraph Company last Sunday with all the attending scenes which naturally follow a terrific wreck of this character. Two weeks previous to the performance of the wreck scenes, preparations had been going on in view of making it the most realistic picture ever enacted. There was no disappointment in the results.

Five cameras were trained upon the point of contact to circumvent any possibility of failure. Attached to one of the engines were three day coaches running at full speed and filled with people. The other engine was running wild beyond the control of the engineer and his assistant. The collision was so nicely timed that every point of detail in this exciting crash is shown, giving a perfect idea of what it means to those who have gone through a railroad collision and have lived to tell their experiences.

At 11:45 a.m., the two great iron horses rushed together at terrific speed. The crash of the encounter was so great that the two boilers were forced into each other like two tomato cans, telescoping inextricably. As flames burst forth like the belching of a great furnace, the coal tender of the first engine was driven half way through the coach behind it, grinding it into kindling. Large bolts and other parts of the engine were thrown hundreds of feet away by the force of the contact. One large section of the engine weighing forty or fifty pounds was thrown within three feet of one of the cameramen, who occupied a position of fifteen feet away from the point where the engines came together. Two of the cars were thrown from the track down the embankment where they lay on their sides.

The shrieks of men and women brought those within the sound of their voices and those passengers who were not seriously injured to their assistance and immediately the work of rescue began. People were pulled from the doors and from the upper sides of the burning cars, carried in strong arms or on stretchers to a safe distance from the wreck to receive the attentions of kind, administering hands. Messengers were sent to South River for doctors who came post haste in automobiles and other conveyances to give succor to the injured. When the nearby residents of the neighborhood heard that the wreck had taken place, they flocked in droves to see it.

The writer, who stood near a newly-arrived party of excited neighbors, heard them ejaculate cries of horror, saying "Wasn't it terrible." "How did it happen?" and those who were assisting in the portrayal of the play were obliged to restrain them from rushing into the scene. When told that it was only a moving picture, they looked with open eyes and mouths, more puzzled and startled than ever. It was the first time they had ever seen anything of the kind, and after their first fears had subsided they all indulged in a sort of hysterical laugh which gave relaxation to their first horrified and mistaken feelings at what they saw.

When the great clash of the engines was over, and before taking the subsequent scenes, refreshments were served under the trees of a nearby grove. The participants in the trying ordeal through which they had just passed were thus given renewed vigor to take part in the work of the afternoon.

The whole picture was under the management of Director Ralph Ince. The arrangements and preparations for the collision were made by A. V. Smith and Walter Ackerman and their fellowworkers of the Vitagraph Company. So well did they carry out their work that during the taking of the fearful and heartrending scenes there was not one person injured or a mishap of any kind. After the day's work, which ended at five o'clock, the 150 Vitagraphers boarded the special train which had been engaged for their transportation and started homeward with song and laughter, well satisfied and happy over their mimic achievements.

The railroad wreck will be made the exciting climax of a film drama which will cost the Vitagraph Company over $35,000.

BIG FOUR FILM COMPANY TO HANDLE EXCLUSIVE SUPPLY CORPORATION FEATURES IN DALLAS, TEXAS

Contract for the handling of the feature product of the Itala, Solax, Great Northern and Gaumont companies has been arranged between Mr. Joseph R. Miles, representing the Exclusive Supply Corporation, and Mr. J. C. Corwin, acting for the newly organized Big Four Film Co., of Dallas, Texas. The headquarters of the Big Four Company will be in the Praetorian Building. The contract will cover a period of sixteen weeks.

Mr. Corwin, who is a capitalist and the possessor of large commercial interests in the Southwest, purposes putting "Big Business" methods into operation. His theories and practices of efficiency in the feature renting operations are expected to stimulate business.

FILM SHOWS ON BOARD

Transatlantic lines may soon add another item to their list of "home comforts." It is proposed to introduce moving pictures as part of the entertainment on the voyage.

The New York Times correspondent learns that there has been a movement for the last year on the part of several large concerns to get concessions from the steamship companies to give film shows on board, but that it has met considerable opposition on account of the declaration of the fire underwriters that the films were inflammable and would increase the insurance rates.

The idea of the promoters is to establish shows on board the twelve biggest boats and to run performances nightly in the first cabin saloon and to arrange special nights for the second cabin. They believe that there will be enough money in the venture from subscriptions, for the steamship companies will naturally not allow any direct charge to be made to passengers. One of the promoters, Sydney Cohen, formerly the representative of the Gaumont Film Company, will attend the conference in Liverpool.

It is understood that the project was first brought to the attention of the White Star Line, but was discouraged by Bruce Ismay, then Chairman of the Board of Directors, who said: "If we start this sort of thing we shall soon have to engage Melba for one of our boats, because a rival line has secured the services of Caruso." But it is now believed that if the underwriters do not object the companies will grant permits when they learn that the idea has had a trial on Pacific liners which have run a number of educational films showing the industrial development of various countries, and that the experiment has been successful. Films were also shown aboard the Imperator during the Kaiser's visit to Hamburg.

The class of films which it is proposed to show on the Atlantic liners is topical. There may also be various plays and a lecturer for each show—New York Times.

Philadelphia, Pa.—L. P. Shoemaker is estimating on alteration to the South Broad Street Theatre and to the Grand Opera House, Broad street and Montgomery avenue.

STREYCKMANS RESIGNS FROM THE MUTUAL TO ENTER BIG FEATURE FILM ENTERPRISE

The announcement that H. J. Streyckmans has resigned from the Mutual Film Corporation to exploit big features in six reels and more should make the exhibitor think seriously. Mr. Streyckmans has been a spectacular figure in the industry of America, and has probably helped to make more history than any man in it.

Among those who know him he is known as the "oracle," and he has never been wrong in his prognostications. It will be remembered that he launched the International Projecting & Producing Co., which was the first independent organization, and is in fact the father of the independent movement in America.

When the New York Motion Picture Co. was involved in warfare with the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., Mr. Streyckmans headed the Baumann-Kessel forces and took charge of the situation in Chicago and later in California.

To a representative of the News Mr. Streyckmans said: "I am firmly convinced that the evolution of the moving picture points to big productions. Every film of this kind—of merit, of course—has been highly profitable to those handling it and the theatre exhibiting it. My company, the Pasquali-American Co., will handle nothing but real feature films, produced at great expense. State rights will be sold on these pictures, with the exception of 'The Last Days of Pompeii,' for which we have paid $50,000 for the rights to America, and which we will book ourselves, handling the subject as though it were Sarah Bernhardt in the flesh. I have already been besieged by offers from big theatrical men to book this picture.

H. J. STREYCKMANS

"That it pays to make these big subjects is proven by the fact that Pasquali has expended $250,000 on this production, but he has already sold the world's rights for $400,000,—a profit of $150,000. I will shortly announce an exhibition of 'The Last Days of Pompeii' for the press and theatrical representatives.'

The members of the feature film business are to be congratulated upon having in their midst a man like Mr. Streyckmans, who has the confidence of the trade, and whose reputation as a forceful, energetic man is well known.

Wichita, Kans.—Albert Baker, 225 South Fern street, and Charles Hill, 206 Fern street, are going to open a show at 1020 West Douglas avenue.

EDITORIAL OBSERVATIONS

Yes, we have a new editor, with new ideas and plans for a forward movement. A new dress is contemplated.

* * * *

Our new editor has never been connected with dramatic or theatrical publications; rumors now current are without foundation in fact.

* * * *

Complexions may come and complexions may go but freckles stay on forever.

* * * *

From now on our editorial expression will consist of the consensus of opinion of our staff; it will never again be the independent conclusions of one man.

* * * *

The trade—manufacturer, exhibitor and projector—will find suggestions welcomed; if each of these three acts as censor to prohibit the exhibition of film whose moral effect is deleterious, the work of the Board of Censors will be comparatively small.

* * * *

In these comments much room is left for inference; infer what you will and it still remains true that the public does not know—has never been told—half the truth about the kings in the moving picture business; there are good kings and bad ones, little ones and big ones, in fact, all kinds; news is news and this paper purposes catering to the entertained public as well as to the trade in future.

* * * *

Clem Kerr called at our office a day or two ago. He is clean cut and forceful in his talk. He says the heads of most film-producing concerns have a history which ought to be published. Suggestions are always welcome and in order.

* * * *

No stream can ever be any purer than its source. Is it to be expected that former proprietors of gambling places, questionable houses of entertainment, circus and show barkers converted into producers or exhibitors of films will serve to improve the moral tone or effect of the picture shows?

* * * *

And there are exhibitors whose antecedents are equally as bad or worse than those of some producers. To enlighten the public it may be necessary to expose the concealed rottenness in the business. It can be done; the information is at hand.

* * * *

The best kind of an operator is a union operator. Why? Because the union establishes and endeavors to maintain an average ability among its journeyman projectors. The exhibitor and the audience are thus alike protected and served by skill in the booth. Every amateur operator should be looked upon as a sure fire, sooner or later, by the fire department.

* * * *

The News stands for all that is high, noble and beneficent in the moving picture business; it will expose the corrupt, praise the praiseworthy, condemn the wicked and, without fear or favor, exert itself to advance the cause; the day of pictured murders, robberies, hold-ups, domestic intrigues and piebald Indian fakes is over; the legitimate moving picture field is to be found in educational lines and there are many such.

With this issue the Moving Picture News enters upon a new era, but continues as a representative organ of an industry that has in a few years assumed proportions far beyond the expectations of the optimistic minds of the original master brains of the motion picture industry. Today new conditions have arisen, public demands more exacting, competition on a keener basis, but most manufacturers have arisen and are proving themselves equal to the new order and requirements. Enormous capital has been invested in the construction of studios and manufacturing plants which will enable them to produce films that will stand as a memorial to their genius and business acumen.

The Moving Picture News has seen this industry grow and thrive. It has represented it through its infancy and will continue to grow with it, advocating the good, condemning the bad. We join hands with the entire trade in mutual co-operation for the advancement of the greatest amusement and educational factor the world has ever known.

MISS MABEL NORMAND

Miss Mabel Normand, whose picture is presented on our cover this week, is the charming leading lady of the Keystone Film Company, and is considered one of the must beautiful as well as capable artists on the screen.

Before her present connection with the Keystone Company, Miss Normand was well and favorably known as a clever performer, both with the Vitagraph and later with the Biograph Company. Her work with these two organizations attracted considerable attention and praise and when the Keystone Film Company was formed Miss Normand was taken over, together with Mack Sennett, Fred Mace and Ford Sterling. This famous company of funmakers made an enviable reputation for themselves while the Biograph Company and the Keystone Film Company are to be complimented on their business acumen in securing these prominent players.

Miss Normand, besides her personal charm and beauty, has an original style all of her own while working in pictures and in the particular style of comedy which the above company is now making a specialty of. Miss Normand has attracted attention by her work from picture-play fans all over the country.

She is an accomplished horsewoman and a champion swimmer and high diver and before entering picture work was recognized as one of the best women swimmers in the world. She is athletic to a degree and fond of outdoor sports of all kinds, in many of which she excels her male competitors.

Under the direction of Dr. Millard Knowlton, the New Jersey State Board of Health has made provision for lectures, with motion picture illustration, on hygiene and sanitation throughout the counties of the state. The names of the films shown, such as "The Trail of the Germs," "Boil Your Water" and "The Fly Pest," indicate their character. Afternoon exhibitions are given for school children and evening illustrated lectures for the general public. Audiences aggregating more than a hundred thousand have already attended.

KINEMACOLOR LICENSED BY PATENTS CO.

Licensed Exhibitors May Hereafter Use Kinemacolor in Their Houses

As we go to press the announcement is made by the Kinemacolor Company of America and also by the Motion Picture Patents Company, that Kinemacolor films have been licensed by the Patents Company and may hereafter be shown in all houses using licensed film.

This will not be so much of a surprise to those who have watched the career of Kinemacolor closely, as it has been well known amongst the exhibitors and manufacturers that Kinemacolor had made wonderfully rapid strides in the last twelve months and that it would have to be reckoned with as one of the big elements in the film business.

Since the beginning of the production of American made dramas and comedies over a year ago, the installations of Kinemacolor service have rapidly increased. A great many exhibitors, particularly in the high class vaudeville houses, who had been anxious to install Kinemacolor have hesitated to do so on account of the colored films not being licensed. Immediately on receipt of the Patents Company bulletin showing that Kinemacolor was listed amongst the licensed films, a deal was started through the United Booking Offices to supply Kinemacolor to a number of the big time houses.

It is understood that this arrangement with the Patents Company will not affect Independent houses now using Kinemacolor.

This arrangement will be independent of the General Film Company and the Kinemacolor output will not be released through them.

BARTLEY McCULLUM

Bartley McCullum is well and favorably known to the public as an able player for upwards of thirty years. Always clever, he is recognized as one of the stalwarts of the stock days when a player really served a rigid apprenticeship and became a real actor. Always anxious to be in harness, he for twenty-five years managed and directed stock companies, principally in his native city, Portland, Me. Seeking a more restful line of work he has joined the Lubin forces at the home plant, Philadelphia. His vast experence is a telling factor in the studio and doubtless he will be recognized in the photoplays as one of the old favorites of the stage.

GAUMONT COMPANY TO HAVE CITY OFFICES

Suite 1503 Taken in World's Tower Building.

In order to more thoroughly cope with the amount of work necessitated by the recent additions made to their Flushing plant, whereby the capacity and output of the firm has been more than doubled, the Gaumont Company has rented a large suite in the World's Tower Building (14 West Fortieth street), New York City, consisting of offices, projecting room, shipping department, and reception rooms. From September 1st onward a great deal of the office work will be transferred from Flushing to New York, and it will undoubtedly be a very great convenience for customers.

The Gaumont firm has lately entered into extensive contracts for printing and developing. Its plant has recently been thoroughly overhauled, a lot of new machinery has been shipped from Paris to Flushing in order to render the plant up-to-date, and the Gaumont studios now rank on a par with the largest and best equipped moving picture plants in the United States.

MOVIES AT HOME IN THE SCHOOL HOUSE

Thomas A. Edison and other leading lights of the moving picture world, who have studied its serious aims, have been constantly predicting that the ultimate of the moving picture as a factor in civilization, will find its place as a basic matter of education in the schoolhouse, to be incorporated in the common school service studies, as well as in the special feature of advanced study in all branches of science and education. River Forest is a beautiful suburb of Chicago, in which municipality affairs have been administered in very up-to-date fashion. River Forest, for instance, has a business manager, who reports to the board of aldermen, and all the civic affairs are conducted upon a business basis. The latest innovation will be motion picture shows which will be placed in the public school buildings on Saturday nights when the schools open in September. A charge will be made for these shows until the complete equipment is paid for. Then the idea is to make them gratuitous.

THE SOLAX STUDIO AND ITS DIRECTORS

Artistic Careers of Herbert and Madame Blaché

There are two things worth knowing and seeing on the New Jersey side of the Hudson facing New York—the Palisades Park and the Solax studio at Fort Lee. Mme. Alice Blache is credited with being the chief reason for the prominence of the Solax Company to-day. Indeed, in a measure, Madame may be said to be the Solax. Paraphrasing the famous remark of Louis XIV she might well exclaim, "Le Solax c'est moi!" and say this with all due respect to the abilities of her talented and efficient husband, Herbert Blache. But of him, more anon!

Madame Blache is the president of the Solax Company, and is the only woman in America who produces and manufactures moving pictures. She gained extensive experience during her connection with the Gaumont Company in Paris. She was serving her apprenticeship there when the Gaumont laboratory was almost entirely devoted to scientific work and paid no particular attention to cinematography as an amusement feature. Thus she has watched the artistic progress of cinematography almost from its inception, and is thoroughly versed in all of its artistic and mechanical developments.

Madame Blache came to this country about seven or eight years ago. When the Solax Company was established in 1910 she was placed at the head of its affairs. She is widely known for her dramatizations and productions of "Fra Diavolo," "Dick Whittington and His Cat," the "Violin Makers of Nuremberg," "Blood and Water," "Pit and the Pendulum" and many others. She was the pioneer in the production of photo-opera in this country, and is continually working toward the advancement and the uplift of the moving picture art. Her artistic efforts have attracted a great deal of attention here and abroad, and she has received several decorations from French academies of literature and art.

Herbert Blache is of French descent but was born in England. After leaving school he obtained a position with the London branch of the Gaumont Company, where he became thoroughly familiar with the technical and commercial ends of cinematography. He was associated with a number of their important productions, and was eventually given an important post in their business department. While on a business trip to Paris he had the good fortune to meet the chaming young French artiste who afterwards became Madame Blache.

Mr. Blache came to New York about 1905 to represent the Gaumont laboratory, and has had marked success in distributing and exhibiting the Gaumont films in this country. A few months ago he decided to devote all his energies toward advancing the interests of the Solax Company. He will be associated entirely with the production department as his duties in that department will not leave him the requisite time to look after the business end.

At present he is at work on a scenario of Scott's "Fair Maid of Perth." He is also actively engaged on a forthcoming animal three-reel production entitled "Under the Tiger's Paw." The plot is placed in India, but the scenic realism emanates from New Jersey. The plot involves all sorts of exciting episodes. There is a wicked rajah, who has the widow of his predecessor burned on a funeral pyre in accordance with Hindoo custom. The widow is rescued by a trained tiger. The rajah is then killed by the tiger, and his palace is blown up by British troops who arrive just in time to save the widow and her lover from the fury of a Hindoo mob. The part of the widow is to be impersonated by a foreign baroness, who has acted similar roles in Europe.

When the Moving Picture News representative reached the Solax studio he was met by H. Z. Levine, the sales-manager who has also charge of the publicity work of the company. Mr. Levine, on being asked for information in regard to new productions said that the Solax would release on August 22d a play called, "Brennan of the Moor," a story of adventure, remance and realism, abounding in thrill and sensation. Barney Gilmore, the well-known Irish star, will be seen in the title role. Mr. Gilmore will also play the stellar role in "Dublin Dan," another Irish pictureplay from the Solax studio.

Mr. Levine added that other feature productions under way comprise "The Mystery of the Missing Man," to be released in September; "Ninety-three," a three-reel drama adapted by Madame Blache from Victor Hugo, to be released in November, and "Oliver Cromwell," to be released in December, another adaptation by Mme. Blache taken partly from Victor Hugo's play and to some extent based on Theodore Roosevelt's biography of the great commoner.

The Solax has one of the largest studios in America devoted exclusively to moving pictures. Mme. Blache is very proud of the studio as it possesses every modern improvement and is especially well equipped in its lighting apparatus. In general appearance the studio may be said to resemble a glass palace.

In the course of a brief chat with the MOVING PICTURE NEWS representative Mme. Blache said: "And what do you think of our studio now that I have shown you around the place? You don't think we are behind the times, do you, if we are located out in the woods here? You must have a big studio to-day or you can't turn out the feature plays the public require."

"And what do you find most in demand at present?"

"Melodrama, sensation. You know, I prepared an elaborate production of 'Dick Whittington and His Cat.' They said it was fine but we lost money on it. So what can you do? You must follow the public taste. But I don't mean that the public requires melodrama exclusively. Audiences like comedy, too, and dramatizations of standard novels when they are well done. But it is so difficult to get good scenarios. I devote a good portion of my time to writing my own scenarios for feature plays. The scarcity of good scenarios is one of the reasons why my husband resigned his position in the Gaumont Company. In future he and I will both give all the time we can to writing and revising scenarios. There are so few writers of pictureplays who understand the practical and technical requirements of film productions. Many scenarios with good ideas have to be worked over and changed from start to finish before they are suitable to be submitted to the camera."

"How do you like your work here compared with your work in the Gaumont Company?"

"Oh, I like America! There are such great opportunities for advancement. Perhaps I had more artistic surroundings in Paris, and had more artistic people to give me suggestions and encourage me in my work. But, on the other hand, my experience in America has made me depend on my own ideas. It will be a great help to me to be able to consult with Mr. Blache, as two heads are better than one. You know, I am now adapting 'Ninety-three' from Victor Hugo, and we expect it will prove a great feature play."

Afterwards Mr. Blache corroborated what Mr. Levine had previously said in regard to his intention of devoting himself in future exclusively to production work. On entering his office the M. P. N. representative found him hard at work on the scenario of "The Fair Maid of Perth."

"I believe," said Mr. Blache, "that there is a growing demand for historical pictureplays, and if the "Fair Maid of Perth" proves a success I am going to delve for suitable material in all the historical novels I have time to read. I will let you know when the "Fair Maid of Perth" is ready for release, and you must come over and see it thrown on the screen."

Then the M. P. N. representative rode to the Fort Lee ferry in the big Solax stage. On the way he encountered some of the members of the company returning from an outdoor rehearsal.

Violet Horner is the new leading woman of the Solax company. She was formerly with the Imp company, playing opposite to King Baggot. An excellent portrait of Miss Horner is presented on the previous page.

The company includes Joseph Levering, leading man in drama; James, Johnson, heavy; Barney Gilmore, Irish comedian and feature star; Darwin Karr, leads; Blanche Cornwall, character work; Edward Fitzgerald, utility; John Haas, utility, and Frannie Faunholz, comedian.

BIBLE STUDENTS VOTE IN FAVOR OF MOTION PICTURES FOR TEACHING BIBLE HISTORY

Two thousand Bible students, representing every state in the Union, in session at Springfield, Mass., have voted unanimously in favor of moving pictures as a means of teaching Bible history and Bible truths. It was resolved that all such motion pictures, as well as stereopticon slides, used by evangelists and teachers be classified under one general title, "The Photo-Drama of Creation."

It may be inferred from this title that the ambitious purpose of the Bible students is to portray the events of biblical history from the beginning, but it seems likely that securing films representing the first six days of the world in the making will tax the powers of the most ingenious picture makers. To depict the creation of the firmament and of the waters of the earth and of the sun and moon and stars out of the void will be, it can hardly be denied, a rather formidable undertaking.

The Bible contains many interesting and dramatic stories which would be equally interesting if they could be reproduced in a visual way, but how will the "movie" managers get them? How, for example, shall Jacob's ladder be portrayed, with the angels ascending and descending on it? The little episode of Samson and the 300 foxes, whose tails he tied together, "with a firebrand in the midst between two tails," and then turned the animals loose in the Philistines' corn, will afford some difficulties. Less trouble may be experienced in representing him as pulling down the house at Gaza, in which were thousands of his enemies, killing them and himself.

In these days of ready manipulation of lights and electricity the fiery furnace into which Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego were cast without being consumed could easily be managed. The lions' den, with Daniel unharmed in its midst, could be arranged at any "zoo." The translation of Elijah to heaven in the midst of a whirlwind might be less easy and the handing down to Moses of the tables of stone bearing the Ten Commandments might present difficulties. The Crucifixion and the Resurrection have been so often portrayed in art that these sacred themes could be studied and arranged from great paintings with less chance of sacrilegious treatment than if left wholly to the handling of photographers. The dramatic conversion of Saul might be puzzling and the beasts of revelation could not readily be reduced to films, though as a suggestion it may be mentioned that some wonderful carvings of these beasts of seven heads and many horns are to be found in a certain museum in Indiana.

People in these days, it is certain, do not know what they ought to know about the Bible, and moving pictures might be very instructive, not to say fascinating, for the Bible is a condensed and most dramatic history of a long period of world development. But all the benefit of the instruction would be lost if the work were done in a way to lessen reverence for the Holy Book.

CITIZEN SOLDIERS IN MIMIC WAR

The citizen soldiers of Massachusetts encamped in the Buzzards Bay district gave somie imitations of real war yesterday when they posed for moving pictures. Under the direction of Adjutent-General Pearson, a battalion of the Eighth Regiment went through a series of maneuvers. They scouted for the enemy and found and captured him. They made camp and broke it and took "long" dusty hikes over country roads. And most realistically they assembled for dinner. The pictures will be exhibited in the various armories in New England next winter as a part of the instruction for the militiamen. This and the long marches of the cavalry were the only incidents in a monotonous day of camp routine. The cavalry's record performance to date was a ride of eighty-eight miles in thirty-one hours by three troops. The whole regiment under Major Francis C. Marshall, United States Army, will have a day and night ride to-day.—Springfield Republican.

Sweetwater, Tex.—S. H. Prim, of Dublin, Tex., has been here arranging for the building of a modern opera house on Oak street.

Corsicana, Tex.—Herman Airdrome Theatre building will be erected on the corner of No. Eleventh street and Fifth avenue.

P. A. POWERS TO PROVIDE EXCLUSIVE FILMS

The Warner's Features, Incorporated, Open a New Epoch in the Moving Picture Field to Avoid Ruinous Competition and Shelving of Meritorious Pictureplays

In the last issue we published the announcement that P. A. Powers had accepted the office of president of the Warner's Features, Incorporated. This ought to prove an important step in advancing the best interests of moving picture productions. When the Sales Company was formed it was Mr. Powers who realized the necessity of such an organization, deeming it of vital importance that the moving picture business be provided with an adequate exchange. He also recognized the fact that the provision of a program was an absolute necessity in any large moving picture venture, both for the making and distribution of films.

At the present time Mr. Powers controls the majority of the stock of the Universal Film Company. He is one of the most prominent men who have identified themselves with the independent side of the motion picture business. His success has been largely due to his unusual business ability combined with ambitious and artistic ideas. He has ample capital to carry out these ideas as he has made considerable money as a real estate operator and in various other commercial enterprises. About six years ago he became interested in moving pictures. He is at present treasurer of Joe Weber's Photo-Play Company and is general manager of the Independent Film Exchange. Early in September he expects to complete the elaborate moving picture factory that is being constructed at Bayonne, N. J., and which is to be known as Powers' Laboratory.

On entering the offices of Mr. Powers, in the Candler Building, the Moving Picture News representative first encountered J. A. McKinney, secretary of the Warner's Features, Incorporated. Mr. McKinney said that the agreement under which the company was organized was ratified on August 1st. He said the new concern will take over the twenty-two exchanges in this country and Canada operating hitherto under the Warner's Feature Film Company, with headquarters at New York City. The cities in which the exchanges are located comprise Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Kansas City, Indianapolis, Dallas, Washington, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, Boston, Buffalo, Minneapolis, New Orleans, Seattle, Denver and Toledo. The two Canadian cities that have exchanges are Toronto and Montreal. The company has also an important exchange in London, England.

Mr. McKinney laid stress on the fact that the new Warner's Company is a solution of the problem that has been a stumbling block to producers. Many manufacturers have undertaken and many others have been willing to undertake the making of pictures of the greatest proportions and value, but owing to the present combinations, they could not reach the exhibitors with their output. "On the other hand," said Mr. McKinney, "the exhibitors have been handicapped in their efforts to increase their business by the stronghold in which manufacturers who have had exchange interests have entrenched themselves and followed their own disposition as regards the quantity and quality of the film they prepared. The new company's operations open a new epoch in the motion picture field. Exhibitors will have the assurance from now on that the American and European manufacturers will vie with each other in their efforts to meet the growing and exacting demands of the patrons of moving picture playhouses for productions of excellence and originality. No motion pictureplays of extraordinary quality will be shelved by reason of there not being an opportunity for spectators to place the stamp of their approval thereon and secure for the manufacturer the returns he deserves for his initiative and ability in producing the kind of film on which the growth of the patronage of the business depends.

"A number of manufacturers have been anxiously awaiting the opportunity of securing this outlet, and with their co-operation the program handled by the Warner's exchanges in September will equal any source of supply now available to exhibitors, and give to manufacturers the opportunity they have sought of successful disposition of the productions they can make. The company will perfect its reorganization and direct its operations from its headquarters in the Candler Building.

"As you wish to see Mr. Powers," concluded Mr. McKinney, "I had better take you in to see him while he is at leisure."

Accordingly the Moving Picture News representative was ushered into the private office of Mr. Powers, where he had apparently been holding a business confab with Messrs. A. Warner, H. M. Warner and H. M. Goetz, the officers associated with him in the company. In the course of the interview that followed Mr. Powers said, "As Mr. McKinney has no doubt explained to you, we propose that the Warner's Features, Incorporated, will successfully solve the distributing problem. At present there is a great need of better distribution. The moving picture houses are now entirely dependent on what is provided by the manufacturers, regardless of the quality and of pictures their patrons demand. Our plan is to furnish, by September, a program of three three-part features and three single reels a week, twelve reels in all. This will be an exclusive service—that is, we will not furnish films to any two houses on the same block or to any two houses in the same radius where their respective audiences would see the same pictures and consequently diminish the box-office receipts. In small towns we should only supply our films to a single exhibitor. Our exclusive service will greatly improve the quality and standard of the pictures hitherto provided. We shall pay manufacturers of films from 10 cents to 15 cents a foot and we can afford to pay manufacturers favorable prices because exhibitors are ready and willing to pay an increased rental rate if they can secure the films of quality to increase their patronage.

"There are at least 16,000 moving picture houses in the United States. Many of these houses have been compelled to compete with each other in presenting the same pictures. Those who make arrangements for our exclusive service will no longer be compelled to submit to this ruinous competition. They will no longer have to change their pictures every day, as the exclusiveness of our service will enable them to exhibit our films for two days. We shall obtain our pictures from a dozen different manufacturers. As we are paying good prices we shall have no difficulty in that respect, and shall insist on our privilege to accept only such films as we deem worthy of distribution."

"How many houses do you expect to supply with films?"

"Well, as I told you, there are 16,000 houses in the United States. We shall be satisfied to secure 1,000 of these and probably we shall secure a great many more, owing to the unquestionable demand for exclusive service. The manufacturers who supply us with films will be provided with a special trade-mark so that their work may be duly distinguished, and at the same time give them the benefit of having the good quality of their work advertised. Thus each manufacturer on our staff will be known by his individual brand. The subjects we select will cover both comedy and drama. At present there seems to be a demand for melodramatic and sensational subjects. There is likewise a growing market for films on the educational order. It will not be the policy of our exchanges in the various cities to purchase films. They will be branch offices of the Warner's Features and will rent films to exhibitors in their territory. Our American output will be augmented by securing films from several foreign manufacturers, and these will be exclusive and of the very best type."

BROENING WITH FAMOUS PLAYERS

H. Lyman Broening, responsible for the very unusual and conspicuous camera work of the Monopol Film Company in the past, has severed his connections with that concern and has been engaged by the Famous Players Film Company as camera man for the productions directed by J. Searle Dawley.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Credit on Posters

CAPTAIN LESLIE PEACOCKE, that Nestor of script writers in a recent interview advocated crediting the name of the author on the film poster. For lo, these many years, we have been advocating the very same thing and we are glad to have such backing as that of Captain Peacocke. If the writer evolves an original story, correctly laid out, why he should not receive due credit for it is more than we can understand. The author should have credit on the poster, on the film, in the trade journals and other advertisements. The writer of the short story, the novel, the comic opera, or melodrama, is given due credit before the public. Why not the writer of the moving pictureplay? Thirty-five or fifty dollars payment is not enough; give credit where credit is due. There is probably no more versatile or able literary worker in the moving picture world to-day than Captain Peacocke. He understands, if anyone does, the labor and the invention necessary to turn out a good moving pictureplay. And when he advocates poster credit for the author he advocates only what is just and right.

A Note of Discouragement

Here is a letter to the department that sounds a note of discouragement: "I believe I am about through writing pictureplays. I cannot sell them. Let us reason a moment. There is a cause for it. First, it is not due to improper preparation, nor yet the lack of an interesting story, nor a dearth of tense situation in the action. Neither are my rejections due to favoritism shown others, at least not all instances, though it might be true in some instances For example: My own success in selling a comedy-drama to Vitagraph was, in my opinion, nothing more or less than a mark of appreciation of the stand I took in defending their production of that masterpiece, 'The Reincarnation of Karma' and they practically made me a present in recognition of their appreciation. They have never produced the story on the screen and never will. They did not buy it because they wanted it, for they have refused to purchase any more of my efforts. No other company has ever accepted one of my scripts and, in all likelihood, never will. To 'get the money 'is not all; it is an infinitesimal part of the earnest worker's idea of success. My solution of the situation is that there are too many would-be and really-are successful writers in the field, with the result that companies are flooded not only with worthless scripts, but with strong, worth-while scenarios, and I merely happen to be one of the unfortunate ones who do not arrive. It is the fault of neither the editors nor myself. It is the result of a condition over which neither they nor I have any control. A quitter? No. But I am not sufficiently a gambler to stay in the game with such overwhelming odds against me. You may, and probably will call me a quitter, but you will, at least, give me credit for knowing when I've had enough."

Now the fact is that the rejection of a three-reel script was the straw that broke this particular camel's back, etc. He is not a quitter. For a year past this particular writer had been trying, and trying hard, to succeed—and he has sold but one story. In this, his hour of discouragement, he is inclined to think that Vitagraph accepted the plot out of gratitude. We do not believe that Vitagraph is handing around checks from any sentimental standpoint, and we think that they wanted that story or they would not have purchased it. Reputable film concerns are not to be bribed or coaxed, Vitagraph least of all. There are not too many successful writers in the field. There are far too few. Many of those successful writers, so-called, would not last ten minutes if stories other than machine-made would come along in satisfying quantities. There is invariably a market for strong worth-while plots. Why become discouraged; the profession is not a gamble. Gamblers do not like to work and toil; you must if you would become successful in the writing of moving pictureplays. We wrote twenty scripts before we had one accepted; we know of a star writer who labored over two years before he made any headway; there are certain obstacles to overcome before any goal can be reached. Perk up, you who are discouraged; keep pegging away; what others can do, you can also do with some thought and labor. Be optimistic and work, and this time next year just write us another letter!

Editorial Etchings

Henry W. Mattoni, successful script writer, is also a world-famous inventor.

R. D. Stoddard, author and editor, has returned to Cleveland after a vacation spent in the Empire State.

Walter MacNamara has enlisted again under the Universal bunting and is an assistant director. He deserves the promotion.

Raymond Hoadley, son of Editor and Mrs. C. B. Hoadley, is a comer in the New York film game.

Calder Johnson expects to go to the coast to look over conditions there as to needs in way of Universal scripts.

George Hall has quit directing and is back in the scenario game. He is a Universalite.

"Giles Warren is one of the best directors in the game and he will succeed if any of them will," is the sentence contained in an official letter received from the head of a big film group.

Our Opinion Also

In a series of articles on "The Photoplay" appearing in The Photoplay Author, written by Arthur Leeds and J. Berg Esenwein, we quote the following paragraph: "There can be no doubt that, once each has mastered the working rules of pictureplay construction, in spite of the fact that one man in a thousand without any previous knowledge of writing may become extremely successful, the chances for quick and continued success are about ten to one in favor of the trained fiction writer." This has been our opinion for a long time. It stands to reason that the writer of fiction, a writer trained to plot-invention, or the newspaper man trained to almost every kind of writing should be among the first to score in the new profession once they have learned the rules. However, every writer was once a beginner and the novice who will persevere has an opportunity to show. In one sense of the word no literary training is necessary for pictureplay construction, but imagination and the ability to see an idea and grasp it are of essential import. As we have repeated in the past, if you have the goods you will be accorded recognition whether a famed writer or a newcomer.

Essanay Needs

Essanay is in need of comedies, farce comedies, heart interest dramas and sensational melodramas in one and two reels that, of course, are within the bounds of the Board of Censorship. Essanay has a company of artists capable of portraying only the best that can be written for them as their former work on the stage has been in the best productions. It is impressed upon well-known writers that Essanay is paying top-notch prices for available material that is carefully written. The Essanay company is not an easy market, and it is no use sending slip-shod or inferior stories, but large sized checks await those who can submit the kind of stuff Essanay wishes.

The Deitz Family

Maibelle Heikes Justice, who has slipped away to the country to make up for lost time in fiction work, has just completed and handed in to a Chicago industrial concern the three-reel scenario which she was engaged to do of the history of the Deitz family and their famous defense of Cameron dam. The picture was the idea of the two young Deitz sons and, produced on the actual land, this promises to be an interesting picture. The play covers a period of seven years and entailed much research work. It is expected that the picture will do much toward securing the pardon of John Deitz as there is already a petition in circulation toward that end. Miss Justice read over 250,000 words of press clippings while preparing her story.

PERTINENT POINTERS

Send no split-reel stuff to Vitagraph at present.

* * * *

No concern will pay $1,000 for a "winning script" so keep your work for legitimate advertisers.

* * * *

Cut our your Westerns; the market is getting more and more difficult.

Philip A. Holman is editor of the Pilot Films Corporation, Yonkers, N. Y., and he is in the market for both comedy and drama.

* * * *

Don't ever roll your manuscript. This is almost as great a crime as to write on both sides of the paper.

* * * *

Remember the European market when submitting your stories. Make your plots universally interesting. American humor or tragedy is not always French or English ideas.

* * * *

If you are selling one company pretty regularly do not bombard that particular editor with all kinds and designs of plots. Submit only your very best and do not go too fast.

* * * *

Staff writers will not interfere with your work, providing it is meritorious. Most of the staff writers have exhausted all originality and many are paid to reconstruct the fresh ideas of the outside contributor. Write the story that is interesting in itself, not because of the dictagraph which you have figured so prominently. Then the dictagraph can be cut out and the plot used otherwise. In other words, have a good story and do not write a string of incidents around a battleship, a dictagraph, or an airship.

* * * *

Learn to know a story when you see it. The cub reporter doesn't know a good story when he sees it and that is why he is a cub. The knack of discovering a good story or plot, taking it apart and finding out its greatest possibilities, is no small art. Observation must first be cultivated to get the story, then experience in construction is necessary to get the idea down properly on paper. Be observant and notice the little things.

* * * *

The field is not overcrowded with good writers, as some experts would have you think. In fact, the pictureplay-writing field is rather large right at present and many manufacturers are desperately hard up for the right kind of ideas. The star writer of two years ago may be the hack writer of to-day. He cannot always turn out highly original stuff. There is room for the capable amateur. Hit upon truly ingenious plots and situations and you will be welcomed with open arms by any editor in the business to-day.

Do Your Best

Are you doing your level best? Many are not. Every day we get long letters from amateurs breathing discouragement and lack of faith. These writers are spending time in fancied grievances which could well be occupied in studying the pictureplay. Rewrite old plays you have seen in the theatre, not for market but for practice, and endeavor to discover the methods of construction. Visit the pictures regularly, not for entertainment but for study. Try and find the reason for this and that situation. Study the casts, their numbers, and the methods of subtitling. And above all write. Grit your teeth and keep at it. Do your best. Oh, no, you're not doing your best, either! You spend time and postage writing us about some little grievance, generally springing from your own imagination. Use that imagination to a better purpose. Do your level best and you will have no time for lengthy letters and no time to pick out fancied wrongs. Persevere and—do your best!

Something of Value

The use of adjectives is important in the pictureplay script. Make your adjectives tell right from the shoulder. Here is a little adjective hint from The Writer's Magazine:

"We are sometimes lost for the best adjective. I have made an adjective dictionary which has proved invaluable to me. The words are not classified alphabetically, but under titles of the subjects which they describe. For instance, take "color" for a subject. On the top of a page I write the word color and under this heading every adjective, or word, however foreign, which could be used as an adjective of any color, tint, shade, etc. I have pages for adjectives of immensity and greatness, for smallness and insignificance, for virtue, meanness, power and allied subjects which we write about every day. In reading, as I find words used as adjectives in new ways, I enter them in my dictionary under their proper classification. By constant reference to the dictionary when writing, I can quickly find the best of a dozen or more adjectives and select the one of exact weight for my purpose."

Front Page Stuff

Not so very long ago the "front page stuff" was all about the war in the Balkans and, consequently the film editors were deluged with Balkan war plots. Then the scene shifted to scare-heads about Japan and Uncle Sam and, consequently, the editors have been receiving stories in which the Jap spy and the brave Yankee lieutenant figure. Then the "front page stuff" shifted to Mexico and Mexican stories will be plentiful. Don't do it! Avoid the "front page stuff." If you are searching the newspapers for plots look away on the inside for some obscure item that will furnish an idea to you alone and not to thousands of others. Better avoid the newspapers in your search for plots unless you can search intelligently.

The Use of the Sub-Title

The sub-title or leader is to be used when needed and not otherwise. Certain writers think they must insert a sub-title every so often in their script whether it is essential or not. Avoid the sub-title wherever possible. Never begin the first scene in a script with a sub-title notwithstanding the fact that you see it frequently. Use subtitles only when essential, and be sure they are essential, for sometimes the scene can be so written as to avoid their use.

The Great Tragedy

A beginner writes in that he "is strong on tragedy" which leads us to jot down a few thoughts on tragedy. The great tragedy enables the beholder in reality to discuss his own griefs, his own loves, his own repressions under a discussion of the play which handles these themes. It is really a form of confession. Tragedy may be compared not to the symptoms of hysteria, but to its cure. Tragedy furnishes an emotional outlet for our suppressions. Good tragedy gives us a sense of expansion and elevation and makes us feel that our taste for it is not merely permissible but salutory. There will always be a market for good tragedy. It is easier to evolve than comedy—but it is not easy at that.

Knowing Your Market

"Hundreds of writers are failures because they are ignorant of the kind of material wanted by the script editors," remarked an editor recently. "A good rule is to create an interesting romance and then surround the principals with a sequential series of setbacks. Finally remove all obstacles by evolving a big climatic scene. The love story should be started in the very first scene and should keep the leading characters busy until the final fade-out. All scenes should be numbered "Scene 1, Scene 2," etc. About thirty-five scenes should make one reel of film or a thousand feet. Have your scenes contrasting to avoid sameness. Avoid all morbid themes. Aim to teach a lesson. The motion picture story is marching ahead, not standing still, and what the editors long for is the fresh idea. Old stuff has been revamped so long by the contract writer that the directors are almost desperate for something new. It is hard to find and so you find many literary adaptations. Look at the coming releases, Scott, Thackeray, Dumas, Dickens, yes, and many others of the old authors are pressed into service simply because of the dearth of ideas. Good money will be paid for original stuff whether it is in technical form or not." The editor who is quoted above is actively engaged in the work and his statement is worthy of profound attention from script writers.

Another Call

THE FILM RELEASES OF AMERICA

New Feature Film Company Present Strong Subject for Their First Offering

The new feature company, The Film Releases of America, makes its debut under most favorable auspices. Its first offering, "Doctor Nicholson and the Blue Diamond," is chock-a-block throughout its four thousand feet with excitement of the kind which keeps us lying awake nights thinking of it.

In Dr. Nicholson we have a new and entertaining variation of the Raffles character. The scientific crook is the doctor, a sort of Sherlock Holmes gone wrong. A man of mysterious ways and means, his malevolent schemes to obtain possession of the blue diamond keep the spectator on edge as to whether the rule of happy endings can be consistently carried out.

The scenes of the kind which send thrills cavorting up and down our spines, are abundant. They come. They crowd so quickly that as one spectator said upon its first showing, "I lost my breath and had a hard time recovering it."

The story wastes little time in getting into action. There is the baffling element of mystery and the doctor's office with its mysterious doors and grinning skulls is significant of dire deeds to follow.

Dr. Nicholson commands a band of consummate crooks who make things lively for the hero, the heroine and their detective. This band has the faculty of running around in dark and daylight in speedy automobiles, black cloaks and concealing masks. At the gentle art of overpowering servants and twentieth century burglary they are adept. Their methods are strictly up to date. In drilling their way into the safe which contains the blue diamond, they attach their drill to an electric current and swiftly, keenly, the bit bites its way through the adamant steel.

One of the clever pieces of diabolical work on Dr. Nicholson's part is his projected revenge on the hero, who fails to come under the doctor's devilish dominance. He has an especially prepared bomb inside of the clock's mechanism which at the hour of one, by its own workings, will explode and destroy the mansion and its occupants.

It is exciting to see the seconds quickly tick away, until it is within two minutes of the hour of destruction.

Then the alert detective discovers that within the clock is the engine of doom, of whose explosion at the hour of one, the hero had been kindly notified. The detective grasps the clock and accompanied by the Count, he dashes out into the grounds and throws it into the lake. Just before it reaches the water it explodes. The concussion stuns both detective and Count. As they lie unconscious, Nicholson and his miscreants arrive, bind the Count and carry him away to a dungeon keep.

After intimidation has failed and the Count has refused to drown, although he has been thrown off a high bridge with his hands and feet tied, the doctor decides to take matters into his own hands and goes himself to the home of the heiress and steals the diamond.

Even villains are susceptible to feminine charms, however, and the doctor's infatuation for Anitra, a premiere dancer, leads to his undoing. Anitra persuades him to allow her to wear the wonderful stone at her debut in a new theatre. The Count and heiress bride are at the theatre that evening as is also his doctorship. Through his opera glasses the Count sees and recognizes the blue diamond on the dancer's corsage and immediately goes to her dressing room to recover it. Quicker than he, however, is the doctor, who, seeing the Count and his wife, scents danger and runs madly to the dressing room. Snatching the stone from its setting he flees down the fire escape into the covering of night. On the street, however, he is recognized by the detective, around at this propitious minute, and the latter follows our most interesting villian.

The detective chases the doctor into a railroad station and swings on board the train as it is leaving the station. He pursues the doctor along a narrow footrail. The doctor, realizing that he is being hotly pursued, loses his wonted sang-froid and seeks refuge on the roof of the train that shakes sickeningly on its rapid transit. In his hurry he has forgotten the blue diamond and there on the seat, sparkling in its prismatic scintillance, the detective finds it.

The doctor, desperate at the hot pursuit, decides that he would rather take a chance in chilly waters than to battle with the detective's revolver and the minions of the law. Accordingly as the train rumbles over a high trestle spanning a river, he leaps into the swirling flood. Whether he dies in its lethal embrace or whether he is as masterful a swimmer as a "black art-ist" is left to conjecture.

This is a film in which the reviewer finds so much to interest him that he finds himself in a quandary as to what scenes from the many good ones he should choose for description.

It is not a film for a man to see who goes into a picture theatre with an idea of taking a quiet snooze. If he starts to look at it he will have to continue.

CHANGE OF TITLE

Cines release of August 8th, under title of "House of Mystery" will be released on that date but under the new title "By Unseen Hands." This change was made necessary on account of another picture of same name. We have been advised from the offices of George Kleine that arrangements have been made to care for change of posters.

Indianapolis, Ind.—S. A. Hastings, architect, has plans in progress for the erection of a moving picture theatre for the Atlas Amusement Company at College avenue and Nineteenth street.

The trouble with trying to scatter sunshine at all times is that many of our callers rather object to having their names in the paper and then surprise us by ordering one hundred extra copies.

Meredith Nicholson, of the Indiana literary belt, may become a foreign diplomat. Thus is the danger of him joining the "star" script writers temporarily averted.

Our idea of a perfectly delightful picture would be a film showing the neighbor we don't like very well trying to manipulate a dull lawn mower.

Some of our moving picture stars go to Europe and some have Europe thrust upon them.

Personally we think the meaning of the pictureplay actor who recently said he was going to England with a director in order to get atmosphere, is cloudy.

Of course we are partial to the animated weeklies but we failed to work up any great amount of spontaneous enthusiasm over two hundred feet of film showing an American winning the lawn tennis championship.

Will somebody please write a pictureplay with a brunette heroine?

Many good intentions have been dissipated by an electric piano in a picture theatre.

We should like to see Congress arrange for the preservation of every animated news weekly released. What a record of the world's events such a collection of films would show in years to come. Public men of to-day, events that tend to make history, catastrophes on land and sea, all these would be preserved for many years to come.

The exhibitor should be his own advertising agent. He should buy and pay for judicious advertising in the daily and weekly newspapers of his home town. He should labor long to make these advertisements dignified and convincing and, at the same time, attractive. We have seen more than one exhibitor win out because he appreciated the value of newspaper advertising and possessed the talent of truthfully describing his moving picture programs. Advertise in every one of your city newspapers. Do not play favorites. It is a sad mistake. Every newspaper or journal has its readers. The right kind of advertising will return the expediture a hundred fold.

And while on the subject of advertising we recall our prediction of over a year ago, that the press would see the value of Cinematography and would prove a most valued ally. Our prediction has come true. We do not claim to be a prophet but we did perceive a natural sequence because we were in the profession of newspaper-making for many years. Newspapers are merely reflections of the wishes of the people or of a very large part of a people. The people collectively liked the moving pictures. What could the larger journals do but honestly represent the desires of the readers. Hence the establishment of moving picture departments in almost all newspapers of any circulation in America; hence the nice things said editorially about the moving picture plays and players; hence the sudden change in sentiment of that ringleader of the opposition, the New York World. Good editors keep fingers on the public pulse. The New York World lost the count for a season but it is better to be late than never. The newspapers of this country are doing much to advance the interests of Cinematography. And when they get experts to write their moving picture lore and not depend too much on press agents, the output of newspaper "moving picture dope" will be more to the standard.

The little town of Ashland, Ohio, has a mail-order genius. If you send him a stamp he will send you, aided by Uncle Sam, full particulars as to the most successful way to become a pictureplay actor or actress. He says it is one of the most pleasant and well paid professions. The Ashland genius also asserts that he is head of "the largest manuscript brokerage office in the United States." The Ashland offices will also teach one to write pictureplay scripts in odd moments. "It's a very easy and fascinating pursuit and one makes $100 weekly at it." Were you ever in Ashland, Ohio? It's a pretty little town. There are quiet shaded streets, also the I. O. O. F. Hall, and the Methodist church is a beautiful structure for a town the size of Ashland. The town of Ashland is the county-seat of Ashland County. The entire county has a voting population of 23,000. We wonder if the good folks of Ashland County, Ohio, appreciate the opportunity extended to them at their very doors. The Ashland genius will teach them to earn $100 weekly or will coach them to become moving picture actors and actresses. The Ashland broker is hiding his light under a bushel. He should fold his tents and steal away to more fertile fields. No man is a prophet in his own country excepting the Ashland genius. The world owes him a debt of gratitude for supplying finished actors and actresses and accomplished pictureplaywrights. Three loud cheers for Ashland, Ohio, and its versatile genius, say we!

That sign tacked in the lobbies of many moving picture theatres and reading "Children Under Sixteen Years Not Admitted Without Parents" does not appeal to us. Why is it necessary to have that placard in front of moving picture theatres. The sign is prevalent in certain Eastern states. Happily it is not yet customary in the Middle West to put up the forbidding placard. Who is to blame for the growing necessity for the "Children Under Sixteen Not Admitted" notice? It is not the exhibitor, for he likes the children and desires to be popular with them. It is only infrequently the exchanges. Then who is responsible? Theatres showing those "successful crook plays" which will tour the provinces next season will not display the sign. Children will be admitted, if they have the price. Vaudeville theatres, good or bad, do not find it necessary to tack up the warning sign to the children. Why, then, the moving picture theatre, we repeat. We don't want to see this sign travel further westward. We want to see such stories released that the sign will be unnecessary anywhere. "Children Under Sixteen Not Admitted" is not a good sign; it does not tend to elevate the moving picture industry in the thoughts of passersby who, maybe, are not conversant with the ins and outs of Cinematography. We don't want to see theatres where films for children only are shown. We want to see theatres where pictures are shown that are fit for men, women and children, individually and collectively. This can be done with better judgment and care on the part of certain producers. Make the pictures all for one and one for all. This sign "Children Under Sixteen Not Admitted Without Parents" has gone far enough. Make the pictures and the picture theatres of such an excellent standard that parents will feel no hesitancy in taking their offspring to the entertainments; make them of such character and atmosphere that parents will send their children to the picture shows to keep them out of mischief.

Pottsville, Pa.—Harry Hersker will erect a theatre in W. Hazleton, and work on same will start this week.

Washington, Ind.—Architect A. M. Johnson, of Brazil, received the contract for drafting plans for the new theatre building here.

Chillicothe, Ohio.—Frank E. Aid and Dr. Frank Merkle have purchased a piece of land in the heart of the city, on which they are contemplating the erection of an airdome for moving pictures.

PICTURE MUSIC

Ernst Luz

Playing the Picture

WHAT is playing the pictures? Who is an authority? Has there ever been such a vocation? Who should be a reliable critic? From whence can we hope for aid and encouragement?

Verbal criticism of picture playing has been so overdone that it can be safely relegated to the dead languages, for no good has been accomplished thereby, it having had a tendency to discourage those who could do the most, viz., the producers of film. Wherever it is discussed at all, you will hear the same antagonizing reply. Everybody has different ideas; who is right? What has been the primary reason for such a condition, when it is known that the public hunger for an appreciable musical tone in the picture theatre?

There is but one possible authority, viz., the producer—and he can only be so after he has surrounded himself by a capable, not necessarily a talented performer, but one conversant with the "psychology of music," which is the only study which will to any degree aid one to determine the probable or possible effects attainable by the different combinations of musical tones. No one ever denied that music did not have certain tension effect on all animate beings. While all natures do not respond to it, the effect is there nevertheless, and a response can be obtained even in these cases when a slight suggestion is used to arouse the mental faculties of the desired subject.

Up to the present time the picture has not extended a welcome hand to the really capable musician, who could with a proper study of its intricacies create certain theme ideas which would make picture playing less difficult. Publishers, knowing that there is a positive lack of talent and desire in the majority of cases, feel that it would not be profitable or beneficial to cater to picture music further than a distribution of such suggestive numbers gathered from their catalogues. In the few instances where certain capable musicians of advanced ability were interested in the work, it was an advertising idea on the part of the producers and a sad mistake for the musician. We can all rest assured that no better musical conditions will be created by the pianist who styles him or herself as only a picture player. This type get a position on the "I-hope-I-am-lucky" plan, and if no one complains they are good for a few weeks until the exhibitor is tired of hearing the same old music, when he makes a change if he is at all particular.

In such places where the picture theatre is run on the same principle as a tobacco store, with an atmosphere of anything is good enough if it does not cost much money, the chances are that no music at all would be just as well, were the exhibitor to have nerve enough to try it. Such players surely cannot call their work a vocation, for were it adopted as such they would necessarily attain a certain amount of proficiency, with which they could demand enough respect to be above the floating-around type, yet there are few who dally long in one position.

The players of this type have so disturbed the patronizing public, that the criticisms have taken on the form of suggestion and at the present time any person, even if the nearest thing to a musical instrument that has been in their own home has been a washboard, feels that they are good authority, and competent to give proper musical suggestions for the picture, and you can rest assured they do, and if they are a regular nickel customer, what they say bears a great amount of weight. It is really ridiculous, still the exhibitor cannot be blamed, for if there is no standard, he must cater to the majority of his audience, however difficult it may be.

One could go on forever citing conditions and give obsolete criticism all to no avail, for until the picture caters to the more talented and capable musician, as well as willing, many remedies can never be hoped for, and the only valuable critic will be a satisfied public.

There never will be a more opportune condition for satisfying the greater number of the public than the picture theatre. It affords opportunities for the rendering of all kinds of music at such times when your musical endeavors will be twofold, assisted by the picture on the screen, giving the more critical something to enthuse over, while music lovers will appreciate your endeavors regardless of picture effects. Another point that should interest the musician to know, is that it would be an impossible venture to install an orchestra of average commendable capabilities and hope that the public would pay an admission fee to hear them play; still it is known that in many theatres where the orchestras get fairly good results, many of the audience, when the pictures have an off day, which often happens, will exit, saying, "The pictures were poor to-day, but the music was worth double the money."

When the pictures fall flat, it is in most cases pictures of a prosy kind which have no serious and well-acted plot. It would be much to expect that a musician should be inspired at such times, and were he capable of his best efforts, his work would be entirely for naught. Nevertheless, at this point he can shine, and if he cannot assist the picture, he can musically satisfy the audience, which reverts to the management's interest, who, after all, is the one that supports you and the family. I waited two months to find a good spot in my show to play the "Ballet Egyptien," by Luigini, and the Edison Company was kind enough to make the spot, just as they so often do, by releasing "The Greed of Osman Bey" July 28th. To those interested I would say that this number plays the entire picture by repeating No. 2. This is a classy picture, with the Luigini music it is more so. Another easy one that will have a telling effect on an audience and lay the foundation stone of giving your orchestra a reputation, can be gotten over in connection with the Biograph release of August 2d, "The Monument." Use Tosti's "Good-bye" as trombone solo. Once through, played with expression, will bring tears, and fits the subject, as well as playing the entire picture. And some will say that "picture and music" is not a combination. It is even more than a combination, for they are positively necessary to each other in the advance strides of Cinematography as an art, as well as a stable and lasting form of inexpensive entertainment.

Over the signature of "J. B." a should-be picture music critic writes in a recent issue of a picture periodical, citing incidents as proof that an orchestra is an impossibility in a picture theatre. I would not waste valuable time to contradict such a foolish assertion, were I not positive that the writer was misinformed and, in the words of the street, "talking through his hat." His suggestion of paying picture pianists $50 per week may have been well meant, yet I might suggest that he better wake up soon or all the picture pianist positions will be taken at a great deal less money. When he can show me where I can hear a pianist that is a feature in a picture show, I will find the time to go and enjoy what would be to me a novelty. The day may come soon when pianist orchestral directors can demand some such salary, but never a lone so-called picture pianist, which usually means that the player has a limited repertoire of music as well as ability.

I would also call the attention of this writer to the fact that in a large number of homes pianos will be found upon which many play better music than is usually heard in a picture "show," while others are able to produce noise which makes you hope that you may never hear the instrument played on again. When we get to realize how common the instrument really is, how can we hope that it may ever be a feature that may attract patronage. It is an addition to the small picture theatre, and takes away the monotony of a continued silence, which assists in making the theatre attractive, but don't ever believe that the patrons come for anything other than the pictures. I know of many instances where one or more instruments were added to the piano in small theatres and it was found profitable, for no exhibitor would be foolish enough to add an unprofitable expense.

The writer further shows the smallness of his ideals by telling us that an orchestra is too expensive and no picture theatre could profitably afford one. I wonder does he know how much money can be taken in at the booth of a theatre such as he criticised. His every word would prove that any experience he may have had was limited to the nickelodion. The orchestra he so intelligently criticised was nine days in the pictureplaying business and the leader took his chair for the first time on this July 18th mentioned.

How much could be expected in that time? The picture mentioned was a miserable padded affair, with oft-repeated singing action, not at all necessary to picture clarity. The story required the action in question three times, yet it was put into nearly every scene and each time more or less footage was used. This made the picture musically impossible for pianist as well as orchestra. The only difference is found in the fact that the orchestra will continue to play music and the pianist would kill it. Had this picture been padded with anything else but its musical suggestive action, it would have been inspiring and could have been assisted by music. Musicians need have no fear of such critics, for the plaintive wail exclusively proves that the business is growing out of his or her grasp, and Divine Providence hurry the day.

THE COAST GUARD'S SISTER

Edison

(Taken on the Coast of Cornwall, England)

When Fay Trevenna accepted George Rowe, and Nell Teague simultaneously accepted Captain Moon, things were by no means in so delightful a situation as might have been expected. For Nell had wanted George for herself, and when she saw her case was hopeless, she accepted Captain Moon out of sheer pique.

Captain Moon was old and rich. The engagement ring he gave Nell Teague had been sent all the way from London, and it was something to be proud of. No wonder Fay Trevenna was ashamed of the simple little ring her George had given her when she saw Nell's. And you may be sure Nell Teague lost no opportunities of flaunting the beautiful trinket before Fay.

Smuggling has always been an irresistible temptation to a Cornishman in need of ready money. When George found that nothing would please Fay but a ring like Nell's, he readily entered into a scheme to run a cargo of contraband tobacco across the channel.

Nell discovered the scheme, and hastily wrote an anonymous note to Fay's brother, the captain of the coast guards. Pascoe Trevenna read the note to Fay and she, instantly suspecting the source of her lover's suddenly acquired wealth, locked Pascoe in the guardhouse, and, disguised in one of his uniforms, ran to warn George. As she waited on the beach, she was captured by confederates of the smugglers, but escaped in the nick of time and met her lover as he was bringing the first boatload ashore.

"Oh, Jarge, Jarge," she cried. "Do'ee think I'd have'ee a thief for the likes of I?"

Although George would willingly have destroyed all the tobacco in the world at a mere word from Fay, there was some slight opposition on the part of his smuggling comrades when he set fire to the cargo in obedience to his sweetheart's entreaties. While George was settling this small difference of opinion with his fists, and completing his work of destruction, Fay, still in her brother's uniform, led the finally aroused coast guard far away from their right destination and then disappeared.

The next morning George laughingly agreed with Pascoe Trevenna that the anonymous letter must have been a hoax.

SCENES FROM "THE COAST GUARD'S SISTER"

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

The Committee on Patent Litigation appointed by the Electric Club, of Chicago, Ill., recently reported in favor of the following:

"Resolved, That The Electric Club strongly disapproves of both form and substance of the bill H. R. 23,417, commonly known as the Oldfield Bill, and would regard its enactment as highly prejudicial to the interests of both inventors and the general public; except that the provision limiting the duration of a patent to nineteen years from the date of application is approved."

The report, which is concise, logical and comprehensive, is worthy of further quotation, to wit:

"Our patent system is intended to benefit both the general public and the individual to whom the patent is granted. The latter receives a legal title to property which he has created, this property consisting of an idea which has originated with him and whose application will be useful. From the moral standpoint this idea is as much the property of the individual who creates it as any tangible property may be. Indeed, the property claim may be considered superior to that in real estate, since land is not created by man and is acquired only by taking possession. Our laws give utmost protection, however, to the owner of tangible property, yet even under the protection of our patent laws the exclusive title to an invention is limited to a period of seventeen years. Without the protection of a patent the only way in which the creator of new ideas can retain complete possession of them is through the medium of secrecy. Since it is exceedingly difficult to keep an idea secret at the same time that use is being made of it, it is usually considered advantageous for the inventor to disclose his idea, provided he is given a legal monopoly in its use for a limited period.

"On the other hand, the patent system is of benefit to the public in discouraging the practice of secrecy and inducing inventors to make public their inventions for the unhampered future use of all mankind, and in stimulating inventors to greater activity by assuring them exclusive property right in their inventions.

"The American system of patents is based upon the conception and application of these ideas, and is no doubt one of the factors which has put the United States in the front rank of nations as an inventive people. This is reflected in the extent of our manufacturing industries. The American system is undoubtedly one of the best in the world, and its results have been in the main satisfactory. There are, however, certain details of our system which it is usually conceded can be improved, and any change which is made in existing laws or practice should be with the idea of remedying these minor defects rather than in the line of making any radical departure from the main principles."

Seven hundred and twenty patents issued last week is a pretty good midsummer record, and indicates that Uncle Sam is still able to sit up and take notice—a true progressive industrially at any rate. New York leads with 102 to its credit; Illinois next with 79, and every State is represented excepting only Arizona, Maine, New Mexico and Wyoming. Of the foreigners Germany leads with 28.

The Ryno Film Company, Inc., of New York, N. Y., have applied for the registration of the subjoined Trade-mark for Motion-Picture Films and Projecting Apparatus Therefor, used since April 1, 1913.

The perspective view of the camera box herewith presented is taken from Patent No. 1,066,941 issued to Otto Petermann, of Grotan, N. Y., whose object is to obviate the annoyance and difficulty frequently experienced by reason of disturbance and change of focus when placing or removing the plate holder, etc. 1 designates a camera box, 2 a ground glass frame designed to fit against the rear of the camera box and held yieldingly in position by spring strips 3 applied to opposite sides thereof. The frame 2 is received between side flanges 4 when collapsed against the camera box, the back of the frame being then flush with the said flanges. The spring strips 3 are secured intermediate in their length to the camera box 1, as indicated at 5, the ends of the spring strips engaging pins upon frame 2. The above is the usual construction, one end of the ground glass being adapted to be grasped by the fingers and pulled away from the camera box to admit the end of a plate holder preparatory to forcibly pushing it into position. This manner of inserting the plate holder is unsatisfactory, however, since it is frequently necessary to apply a considerable amount of force thereto, thereby either moving the camera so as to destroy the focus thereof or injuring some part of the plate holder or camera. This annoying feature has been eliminated in the present instance by the provision of a lever 7 by which the frame 2 can be forced away from the camera box and held spaced therefrom when manipulating the plate holder. The ends of the lever 7 are pivotally connected to the camera box, and the opposite sides of the lever are provided with pins adapted to engage the frame 2. When the lever is swung outwardly the pins engage cam depressions 10 in the sides of the frame 2 and force the frame outwardly against the action of the spring strips. When it is desired to release the frame 2 it is merely necessary to swing the lever 7 against the camera box. The two arms of the lever are then received within cut away portions 11 formed in the side edges of the frame 2 while the cross-bar of the lever fits closely against the sides of the camera. This cross-bar may be provided with a finger piece 12 for convenience in manipulating the same, and the outward swinging movement of the said lever is limited by contact of the arms thereof with the shoulders 13 at the inner ends of the cut away portions 11.

William Lord Wright in a recent issue said, "Far be it from us to knock moving pictures, but we do think there are too many death-bed scenes, too many representations of cruelty to children, too many masked robbers shown on the screen, and too much suffering of every kind portrayed. There is enough of all this in real life without adding the unreal." Amen. "So mote it be." We know personally of many individuals who have been disenchanted by gruesome, morbid films, and will not risk attendance at an ordinary mobile picture show for fear of encountering others repugnant to good taste or pleasure. The main function, particularly of the summer garden variety of mobile picture show, ought to be to entertain, instruct and amuse—there should be no chance of disappointment or disgust. "The public be d——d" policy is a poor one in the long run in so far as mobile picture films are concerned. We wish producers and exhibitors could hear and heed what their audiences say about them.

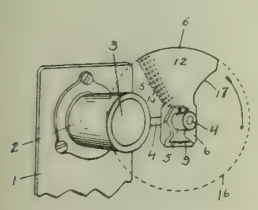
Startled he looked about him. "My legs are comfortable," he muttered. "My knees aren't cramped. I can get the kinks out of my calves and even lean back a little. My line of sight is unobstructed. Why, not only can I see everything, I can also hear everything. I can retire to the foyer without disturbing fifteen people, or even one, but I'm so comfortable sitting here that I'd rather stay just where I am. These lights—the music—the scenery—all look real, yes, they strongly suggest reality—but it's impossible. Whoever heard of a comfortable theatre? I must be dreaming." And doggone it, that's just what he was doing.—The Masses.

A shutter designed to cut off the light abruptly and allow the light to come on gradually so as to throw a steady light on the screen, and prevent flickering and agitation, is the subject of Patent No. 1,067,750 issued to Allen C. Miles, of Belleville, Kentucky. The accompanying perspective view illustrates the essential features of the invention. The frame 1, a part of the machine, has secured to it the projected lens frame 2, carrying the lens 3. From the machine is extended a revolving shaft 4, on which is a clamp 5, in which is firmly gripped the shutter 6. A counterbalance weight 9 is used to balance the shutter. On one side of the head 12 of the shutter 6 are holes 14 and recesses 15 on the edge. These perforations are formed in rows, but may be irregular if desired. Usually they are larger near the edge and diminish in size as they recede. The shutter in revolving describes a circle and moves in the direction shown by the arrow. The picture is thrown upon the screen through the lens 3 and is upon the screen about three-fourths of the time required for the revolution of the shutter 6, the other fourth of the time the space between the pictures is passing through the machine, and at this time the shutter is passing over the face of the lens 3, shutting off the light, and as the solid side 17 of the shutter 6 first reaches the lens, the light is cut off abruptly, and as the shutter passes on in its path the perforated side reaches and leaves the front of the lens, allowing the light to come on gradually, thus giving more light and preventing the flickering and jerking motion of the picture on the screen. In this operation the machine can be run with less electric current as the light is increased and the picture is transferred to the screen in a natural, steady and uniform manner. The gist of the invention consists in providing a shutter which abruptly cuts off the light and turns it on gradually and not suddenly; and the patent contains a claim to a moving picture machine, a revolving shutter provided with a plain uninterrupted side edge, and a perforated side, the edge of the perforated side being recessed as set forth.



Patent No. 1,066,955 relates to apparatus for charging light-sensitive elements united in packages with light-proof under sheets or intermediate sheets. The changing is effected in a dark slide provided with a change box into which the package is removably inserted, and at each withdrawal of the change box from the slide catches provided on the change box withdraw the uppermost element of the pack, which is then pushed in at the bottom when the box is reinserted into the package-container. These purposes are primarily realized by adapting the package to the dark slide, namely, by providing the top of the package with a shutting slide, which in the closed position lies against the catches of the change box when the package is inserted into the slide, so that the catches are unable to prevent the withdrawal of the package from the slide, but immediately engage the uppermost element as soon as the shutting slide is pulled out. The German scientist Dessauer has succeeded in producing mobile X-Ray pictures by means of an apparatus of such exceptional X-Ray power that he is enabled to take six photographs per second, and then by means of a cinematograph to show the movements of swallowing, the throbbing of the heart and other natural phenomena. In the apparatus by which the X-rays are produced is an improved current breaker for the primary of an induction coil which insures rapid break, and a secondary current from the coil of much higher power than usual. When this device is used in conjunction with an X-ray tube rays are obtained of which sharp and rapid radiographs may be taken. At this rate of progress how long will it be before we are able to reveal and review man's subconscious nature, his idiosyncrasies, etc.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

NOTES

"The Treasure of Captain Kidd," a story based upon the life of the famous buccaneer, is shortly to be released. It is the first of a series of stories dealing with famous treasures. The film shows, among other exciting scenes, the capture of a ship and the pirate's attempt to murder a young girl so that her ghost will guard the treasure which he is about to bury.

In order to get the proper atmosphere for a comedy the Pilot is turning out, Miss Louise Vale, the leading lady, spent two days down in the Italian section of New York. Miss Vale played the part of an Italian sweetheart in Pilot's release, "Tony, the Tenor," and her characterization is superb.

St. Clementine, that picturesque and rugged island off the Southern California coast, was the objective point of a recent trip of Fred Granville, the Universal camera man. It was the first time that a motion picture camera had ever invaded the isle, and Granville brought back some splendid films with him.

Mrs. Langtry (now Lady de Bathe) says, "I am proud and happy to appear in a motion picture for contemporary audiences and future generations. To be enrolled in the famous Players Gallery of Artists is a distinction that will survive myself. I am immortal—I am a film."

OVER THE CRIB (Aug. 15).—The tale of two lonely hearts that are brought together by a child whose mother, in great trouble at first, gets her child back and a renewed happiness after the child has accomplished her mission of love. Jerry Smithson is a lonely bachelor with a great and deep love for children. In desperation and to smother the heartache he goes to the asylum where he makes daily pilgrimages to watch the youngsters at play. About the same time a Mrs. Wendell, deserted by her husband and almost destitute, takes her child to the asylum in the hope that it may be adopted into a family that will give it the care and love it needs. Smithson is the man that adopts the child and Dorothy soon reigns complete mistress of the lonely bachelor's heart and home. Finding he, in his awkward ignorant way, is unable to properly take care of her he advertises for a day nurse and Ethel Langdon, suffering from an equal amount of child hunger, applies for the position and gets it. The child, Dorothy, takes to Ethel at once and gradually Smithson finds himself in love with his adopted child's nurse. The culmination of their romance comes when Dorothy, playing a kissing game with the two, orders Smithson to kiss "nursie" and the door to a happy future is opened to both. They are married and wonderfully happy in their own love and almost worship of the tot that brought them together. Mrs. Wendell, however, finds herself in dire straits and just about the time she thinks she can bear the fight no longer her husband returns, penitent and rich. She forgives him and then he learns of the child's being sent to the asylum to be adopted. They go to the asylum and their terrible grief has its effect upon the authorities and they let them have the child's address. Smithson breaks down under their plea, but Ethel realizes, great as her own misery is, that the real parents have a greater right than they to Dorothy. Dorothy is taken to her parent's home and Smithson alone gives way to his grief. Ethel at the side of the empty crib suffers cruelly at its emptiness and weeps over it. Then her sorrow changes gradually to another realization and hurriedly she gets out some tiny baby clothes from her work basket and at the side of the crib, with the tiny garments held tight to her breast, she smiles into a future brighter and fuller than even the wonderfully happy past has been.

RELIANCE

KENTUCKY FOES (Aug. 11).—A feud exists between the houses of Amsden and Nelson. Fred, the only son of Amsden, desiring to procure some property owned by Nelson, writes him a note of truce, which Old Man Nelson promptly returns torn to bits. Fred has a far more bitter disappointment in store when Dorothy Lewis refuses his love and accepts that of Andy Nelson, a braggart and imbiber. Next day, Dorothy scrambling around the rocks near Amsden's estate, sees her lover approaching. Spying her, Andy goes to her and she sees to her indignation that he is intoxicated. She repulses him, but he persistently endeavors to embrace her, until, with raging spirit, she pushes him over the rocky incline. Fred Amsden, on his way home from the fields, hears her screams. She tells him frantically she has killed Andy Nelson. Desiring to shield the girl he loves, Fred drags the lifeless form toward some nearby bushes and is seen by the youngest Nelson boy, Tom. So while Fred is overtaking Dorothy and half carrying her to his house, Tom is racing home with the terrible news. Grabbing their guns, the Nelsons make for their enemy's home. Fred and Dorothy, seeing their approach, repel their attack. One against six appearing hopeless, Dorothy escapes from the rear and runs for help. In the meantime, Fred is holding off the enemy with an occasional shot. Andy, having recovered by this time, staggers to his feet and up the path. Dorothy, running along at full speed, runs fully into him and at first thinks it is a spectre. She then realizes that she is not a murderess. Fred, in the meantime, having used up all his ammunition, is captured by the Nelsons and dragged out and then taken to the place of the supposed murder to be shot for his crime. Arriving at the spot, Dorothy explains all and they learn the truth. The Nelsons are so overjoyed at the recovery of their son that they hold forth the hand of friendship to Fred and depart, taking Andy with them. Then Dorothy turns gratefully to her real hero.

RUNA PLAYS CUPID (Aug. 13).—Runa's mother, a pretty widow, and handsome Dr. Hale know each other by sight only. He, in his garden, has seen her in hers across the way. Runa is taken sick and all through the terrifying hours of her illness Dr. Hale and the frightened mother watch at the little bedside. The night of the crisis is a long, wearying siege, but the dawn brings restful sleep and surcease of fever to the child. In her joy at the baby's recovery the mother sobs out her relief in Hale's arms and it is then that they realize their love. Happy days follow with Runa a cheerful convalescent. But Mrs. Adams' lawyer comes from the city to see her on business. She introduces Hale and, knowing he is a trifle jealous, she pretends a great interest in the other man. THE FLIGHT OF THE CROW (Aug. 11). —FIRST REEL.—"The Flight of the Crow" is a thrilling drama of to-day, dealing with the worries of a wealthy man who has a ne'er-do-well but beloved son, weak and wayward, who drifts from the roseate lights of fashionable clubland down to the depths where, poisoned and enervated, actuated by "wanderlust," he goes out into the great world and becomes a tramp.

The scene opens in the palatial residence of aged John Morgan, whose sole comfort is an adopted daughter, Edwina Washburn. The father had long hoped for a marriage between his son and this lovely girl. Dan Morgan, however, weak of will, spends his time and substance at the fashionable club. Evicted from this association, he goes on down—he finally drifts out from the home city into the byways of the world in the repellent rags of the tramp.

Two years fly by, and the old father, keenly feeling his disgrace, makes a will in which he stipulates his son, Dan Morgan, if he returns and marries Edwina Washburn, will inherit $1,000,000. If she marries anybody else she shall receive the old home place and $1. His legal adviser, Philip Moore, is commissioned to exert every effort to find the son. If he fails to bring the wanderer back to him before he dies, the legal adviser is to receive $250,000, and Edwina, the ward, will receive $750,000 in case she remains single. The old man shows signs of mental failing, and all the cupidity that lurks deep down in Philip Moore bestirs him to delay the coming of the son or frustrate any search that may happily reveal his whereabouts.

Chester Thompson, a prosperous young business man, is deeply in love with Edwina, and while she reciprocates his affection, she is too modest and too considerate of her foster father's wishes to show her love. She does not wish to marry Dan. She and Chester tacitly agree that the ne'er-do-well son should be restored, but he has sized up the lawyer who, instead of trying to conform with the will, devises everything in his power to defeat it. Urged on by Edwina, Chester tries to discover the whereabouts of the wanderer. Accidently visiting an auction house he observes a battered suit case bearing the "monaker" (the signature of the tramp), which is an arrow, the sign of "The Crow." Dan Morgan had been a collector of Indian curios, and when he adopted the nickname of "The Crow" he took the sign of the arrow as significant.

The lawyer has employed a detective whose mission is to shadow Chester and cross his plans in any attempt to discover "The Crow." When the good young man buys the tramp's frayed old suit case, he is accosted by "Pencil Willie," who has been a pal of "The Crow." The result is that he engages "Pencil Willie" to accompany him on a tramping trip.

SECOND REEL.—The scene opens in the office of Lawyer Moore, who has brought legal astuteness and detective acuteness to bear in trying to prevent the finding of the lost heir and secure himself a small fortune while depriving an old friend of the last comfort of his lifelong wish. He was, however, barking up the wrong tree, for Chester had

"A purse as long, and arm as strong,
And an eye as keen as the man he battled with."

A man of wealth, willing to risk the road, riding brakebeams, visiting barrel houses and battling with bums, has a nerve of that quality not to be overcome by the cheap devices of a pettifogger or so-called "de-tec-tive" who preys upon the weakness of his fellowmen—deceiving for profit.

Then follows a series of daring hairbreadth adventures by flood and field, over the cinder-paths, along dusty roads, riding on platforms or brake beams, hiding in musty box cars or camping with the hobos, cooking in tomato cans and dividing the "handouts"—scenes vivid, varied and picturesque that make up the lusty life of the ragged knights of the road. Chester Thompson and "Pencil Willie" study the signs of the arrow upon water tanks, old barns, deserted boats by the waterside, following the trail of the vagrant unerringly. Eventually they discover that "The Crow" has straightened out, married and settled, and in a sense become regenerated. Chester gets Dan Morgan and his wife back to the old home before the father passes to the Beyond, gives him comfort and cheer for his dying moments, so that he accepts the new condition of things, makes a new will, so that justice is done for all. The lawyer scornfully hands Edwina a silver dollar, but she has found a greater wealth of love, as Chester Thompson defies him and takes her in his arms. The old man dies with the child of his son in his lap, which gives peace to his passing. Thus ends the flight of the crow—that turned white.

PATHE FRERES

PATHES' WEEKLY (Aug. 11).

EVERY DOUBLE CAUSES TROUBLE (Aug. 12).—The inimitable Whiffles learns that he is a double to the newly appointed Secretary of Aviation and, being curious, he goes to the Secretary's home. When the latter comes out, Whiffles goes in and he is admitted without question to the private office. He discovers that the Secretary has two appointments—one at three with the Ambassador of Hoboken and one at four with the Secretary's sweetheart. The Ambassador calls, he and Whiffles exchanges notes of doubtful courtesy through the medium of the butler and the Ambassador departs in high dudgeon. Successful in this, Whiffles calls on the Secretary's sweetheart and gets away with it until the Secretary himself arrives.

THE ERRING BROTHER (Aug. 13).—Dan and Tom Reilly work on the same ranch. Tom is a wild boy and gets into trouble with the ranch owner. Dan comes to his brother's rescue at the height of the altercation. They are both discharged. In a moment of drunken frenzy Tom kills a man and makes his escape with his sweetheart Lillian. With their home shattered Dan quits ranching and becomes a traveling salesman for a product which takes him from ranch to ranch. A few years after the murder Dan finds Lillian and, while waiting for his brother to come in, shows Lillian how the magic silver plate, which he sells, operates. This silver plate is poison. In the meantime Tom, who is still frequenting saloons, is recognized as the murderer wanted by the police and is pursued. Reaching home he dashes into the cabin while the others are barricading the house. He reaches a glass receptacle which apparently holds water and takes a drink. The hand of fate had directed him to the cup of poison and he dies before his pursuers can reach him. After his death Lillian finds real happiness in marrying Dan.

THE HOUSE DIVIDED (Aug. 14).—This is a Mexican story in which a Federal officer's sister is in love with a rebel. Through many thrilling scenes the rebel, Jose, leads the pursuing Federals and many times finds an opportunity to see his little sweetheart, though he risks his life to do so. Once, when visiting her, he is discovered by her brother and placed under arrest, but through her efforts he escapes. In punishment for her aiding the rebel she is locked in her room and here, when Jose comes to rescue her, he is caught and led out to be executed. In one last effort to save the life of her sweetheart Dolores rushes to the scene of execution and, throwing herself into his arms, is pierced by the same bullets which end the rebel's life.

PATHES' WEEKY (Aug. 14).

COSMOPOLITAN LIFE IN CAIRO (Aug. 15).—Here, indeed, is one of the most interesting travel pictures ever issued. The life in Cairo is certainly cosmopolitan and we see it in all its phases in this film. The native streets swarming with Arab life, the snake charmer, the street singers, the dancers, all are pictured plying their various trades and winning the shekels from the innocent tourist. The beauties of the Nile, the crude methods of transportation, the marvelous pyramids and the inscrutable sphinx are faithfully portrayed.

On the same reel:

LAKES OF BAYRISCH.—This film takes us into Bavaria, a land little known by those who have not traveled extensively. The Bayrisch lakes are gems of beauty, set in the surrounding hills like emeralds. Wide expansions of water invite the lover of aquatic sports and the natives add a touch of color which makes the scene one of unending pleasure and one long cherished in the memory of the beholder.

On the same reel:

PICTURESQUE JURA.—This little frequented spot in France is well worth the attention of the tourist, abounding, as it does, in verdant valleys and luxuriant vegetation. Winding roads zigzagging up the mountainside afford many opportunities for beautiful vistas across miles and miles of picturesque grandeur. After a lovely view of the River Bienne at Malinges, we conclude with "Evening on the Lake of Chalin." A picture of magic beauty, this, the expanse of peaceful water in the foreground; in the background the mountains fading away in the darkening distance.

THE TURNING POINT (Aug. 16).—Here we have a film dealing with the most fascinating subject: the effort of a band of criminals to obtain a very valuable picture. Their tool is a woman, who, in the power of the leading criminal, attempts to secure the picture by making love to the owner of it. She succeeds in winning his love but also awakens her own with it, her conscience and a desire to live a right life. Her struggle for freedom from her evil associations and the determination of the criminals not to lose so valuable an assistant form one of the most interesting and melodramatic films released in a good many months.

BATTLEFIELDS AROUND CHATTANOOGA (Aug. 13).—About the city of Chattanooga in the Fall of 1863 were fought several battles which for fierceness and bloodiness have few equals in the history of the world. Beginning with the Confederate victory at Chickamauga in September when the Union line under Rosecrans was crumpled up like so much paper and thrown back on Chattanooga, the Southern forces under Braxton-Bragg maintained a close investiture of the city which lasted until the arrival of reinforcements under Grant, Hooker and Sherman in late October.

On November 24, 1863, the Union army commenced a general attack along the line. Hooker, on the Union right, fought the famous "Battle Among the Clouds" on Lookout Mountain, and succeeded in dislodging an equal force of Confederates from that position. On the afternoon of the 25th there occurred one of the most dramatic episodes of the war. The Union troops lying down and resting before the Confederate trenches at the foot of Missionary Ridge suddenly and without orders from either Grant or their officers, arose and charged the Confederate position. Thousands fell in the resulting encounter, but the outcome was a distinct success for the Northern troops.

In 1895 the battlefield of Chickamauga proper was made into a national park. Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain have been made into beautiful parks by the city and state. To-day splendid monuments and monoliths mark the situation of all the stirring events of the early sixties.

The more important monuments and memorial tablets erected by various war societies and states are shown in these pictures. Very striking are the statues erected by the states of Ohio, Minnesota, Florida, Iowa, Kentucky and Illinois to commemorate the heroism of their fallen sons.

Interesting pictures are shown of the cable railway which leads to the top of Lookout Mountain and several glorious views have been taken from the top of that height showing the shining Tennessee River flowing through the heart of the rich valley.

The pictures are excellent photographically and are of decided interest to Americans of the present day.

VITAGRAPH

THE LADY AND THE GLOVE (Aug. 15).—The leading favorite of King Francis' court is the Lady Viola, a lady as witty as she is beautiful. She is courted by the Comte De Lorge and leads him on in his protestations of love. She does not really love him but likes to keep him away from other women.

The Queen secures a new lady-in-waiting, the Lady Anne, a charming young woman, fully as beautiful as the Lady Viola, who at once becomes insanely jealous of her. The courtiers are soon at the feet of the new favorite, who shows her preference for none, save possibly the Comte De Lorge. The Lady Viola is furious and does all in her power to keep him away from her.

By way of amusement, King Francis arranges a tournament of lions, at that time considered a royal sport. The front of the balcony overlooking the arena is occupied by the King and Queen and their principal attendants, among them the Lady Viola the Lady Anne and the Comte De Lorge.

Thinking to force a public showing of the Comte's love for her, the Lady Viola throws her glove into the arena among the lions and dares any man to retrieve it. The Comte, who sees perfectly well what is in the lady's mind, goes to the rail and prepares to descend.

All watch the young man's descent with intense excitement, mingled with fears for his safety, with the exception of the Lady Anne, who cannot bear the sight but faints away. De Lorge picks up the glove and gets back safely to his place on the balcony. Instead of humbly handing the glove to the Lady Viola, as she expects, he throws it in her face, publicly rebuking her. Then, seeing that the Lady Anne has fainted, he takes her in his arms and helps to revive her. His betrothal to the fair court beauty is at once announced and their marriage at the Cathedral is performed amid great pomp and splendor in the presence of the King and Queen and the whole of his glorious court.

AMERICAN

THE BEATEN PATH (Three Parts) (Aug. 20).—The story lifts us up and carries us on, on, into a blinding glare that reveals our innermost thoughts and feelings. It proves the old theory that men are but pawns on the chessboard of Fate; that they may labor, and strive and starve and kill to change her course, but she only smiles, continuing on her inexorable way. In the immortal words of Omar Khayyam, "The moving finger writes; and having writ, nor smile nor tear shall blot a word of it."

Randolph Thorne (Alec B. Francis) and George Ed. Lacelles Hall (Will E. Sheerer) were gentlemen of family and means, whose estates adjoined. A question of the dividing line between the estates resulted in a bitter quarrel which had suddenly reached its climax in a personal encounter between the two men, at the point of land in controversy. Randolph Thorne had drawn a paper from his pocket and declared it proved him right absolutely. Lacelles Hall, whose son Arnold was with him, had been so emphatic in his contentions that the reaction left him weak. Arnold, with the rashness of youth, entered the Thorne library that night, to purloin the paper Randolph Thorne had flaunted. He was seen and recognized by Thorne and followed to his home. Lacelles Hall, feeling himself to blame for the boy's predicament, insisted on bearing the disgrace of arrest and imprisonment. He was led away, on being identified by Thorne amid the pleadings of his son Arnold, and the tears of his bewildered daughter Barbara. His conviction, arrest and confinement resulted in an illness that shortly had its sequel in death.

During the progress of the quarrel, two innocent young persons suffered great distress. One was Chester Randolph Thorne (O. A. C. Lund), the carefully nurtured heir of Randolph Thorne, whose every action was governed by his father and guided by the precepts of his forefathers as set forth in the diary of Randolph Thorne, dating back to 1600. The other was Barbara (Barbara Tennant), the beautiful and unworldly daughter of Lacelles Hall, who had been home from the finishing schools but a short while, and knew little and cared less about the boundary dispute. Chester tried to stop his father from taking extreme measures. Barbara submitted mutely when those measures took her father from her, frightened away her betrothed, Caspar Black, and drove her brother to seek forgetfulness in the primitive world of the great Northwest.

After the death of Lacelles Hall, but two friends remained to Barbara, her diary of the Lacelles Halls, dating back to 1700, and the maid Laura, who refused to leave her. Several years had gone by before Barbara even ventured outdoors. A short distance away, Chester Randolph Thorne sat on a garden bench, rereading for the hundredth time the Thorne diary. In the heat of the noonday sun, he dozed off, and dreamed that the wonderful deeds he had read of in the diary were reenacted before his eyes. As he saw the privations the first Randolph Thornes had endured that he might—as his father kept saying—walk the Beaten Path—Chester was moved to a clearer understanding of his father's motive in fighting so bitterly to conserve the estates for him, Chester.

The maid Laura had persuaded Barbara to play in the neglected tennis courts on the Hall estate. Barbara's muscles, grown unresponsive from disuse, refused to follow her will. So, when she intended to throw the nimble tennis ball to Laura, it flew instead with the speed of an imp, over that same boundary line, and abruptly awakened the dreaming Chester as it smote his eye. Laura recovered the ball and apologized, but Chester had caught a glimpse of Barbara and was determined to meet her. She returned to her room, angry at having forgotten her father even for a moment. His vision appeared to her, begging her to throw away the diary and seek happiness. Impulsively she threw it out the window. At that instant Chester had come up the path. He picked up the book, looked up as she looked down, and smilingly held it out to her. When she did come down, he was so entirely confused that he gave her the Thorne diary and kept that of the Lascelles Halls. That evening, the Hall diary brought melancholy to him, and the Thorne diary strange thoughts of revenge to her. In the days that followed rapidly, Barbara deliberately encouraged Chester's interest in her, in the hope of revenging his father's cruelty to her father thereby. Chester invited her to a dance, and she steeled herself to again appear among those who had shunned her as a convict's daughter. At the dance, Caspar Black, who had become tipsy, publicly denounced her as a convict's daughter. Chester drew her to the protecting side of his parents where she became hysterical and derided his father as the author of her family's misfortunes. She turned abruptly to leave, ran full tilt into a stumbling figure on the grand stairway, and the next moment saw Black stretched dead as his head struck the rail. Chester, running after her, grasped the situation, heroically threw his glove and dance-card beside the dead man, and drew Barbara away. Leaving her in charge of a friend, he raced off in his machine, stopping at her home for a moment to leave a farewell note. Barbara, after telling Randolph Thorne that his son too was now a murderer, reached home as Chester was leaving. To his words of endearment she answered with mockery, and fell raving, bereft of reason, as the man she had striven to not love, left her. Chester fled and was a hunted thing, welcoming what seemed sure death in a forest fire which caught him in his flight. Fate would have it, he was rescued by Arnold, Barbara's regenerate brother. But the flames had done their work. Death claimed him before the officer of the law found his retreat. Babbling of the Beaten Path, Chester closed his eyes to worldly things in the West, as Barbara closed hers in the East. The love that was denied them in life claimed them in death, and together their souls took the Beaten Path to the Great Beyond.

A GREATER INFLUENCE (Aug. 19).—Bob Graham, out on a shooting trip in the Maine woods, accidentally shoots himself. He is found and cared for by Norah, a pretty girl, who takes him to her home and nurses him back to health. After his recovery he leaves for the city, his mother having arrived to bring him home. Despite a strong attachment that has grown between the young couple they are separated. Norah later leaves for the city and takes a position as housemaid to the Grantleys. Bob and his mother visit the Grantleys and Bob and Norah, to their surprise, meet again. After dinner, Dick, the handsome son of the Grantley household, excuses himself and goes into the library to smoke. There he finds Norah and forces his attentions on her. Bob comes into the room just as Dick forces Norah to kiss him, and Bob knocks him down. The commotion is heard and all hands enter the library, among them Bob's mother. Bob sticks up for and defends Norah, but to no avail, and she is given her notice. Bob's mother, fearful of the great attachment between her son and the housemaid sends her a letter offering her a pittance if she would promise never to see Bob again. She returns the money and Bob arrives just in time to see her leave the house. He hastily follows her and requests an explanation for her tears. She shows him the letter and assures him that her love is away above any amount his mother could ever give her. Bob, convinced that social relations were of no importance where the greater influence of love is concerned, takes Norah to a minister and they are married.

THE GHOST (Aug. 22).—A country house has the reputation of being haunted. Two boys are frightened away by a thief who pretends to be a ghost. He has made the place a receptacle for the Remington diamonds, which he and his pals have stolen. They are waiting for the affair to blow over, so that they can remove their plunder in safety.

Jim, a young man of the village, is in love with Gertrude, but her father, Howard, withholds his consent to their marriage until Jim shall have made some money. Jim hears the boys' tale of the ghost and laughs at it, and Reed, a smart young chap, offers to bet Jim ten dollars that he dare not spend the night in the haunted house. Jim takes the bet and goes to the house.

Reed tells Gertrude what Jim has done and she is greatly concerned. She appeals to her father to go and induce Jim to abandon his plan; he refuses, and Gertrude goes alone.

The thief, who has fallen asleep in the house, is awakened by Jim's entrance. Jim overcomes him, and takes away the Remington diamonds. But the other members of the gang arrive, and Jim is compelled to escape to an upper room. The gang follows, delayed by the necessity of breaking down the intervening doors. By means of a fireplace and a chimney Jim reaches the roof. The thieves return to the ground and begin shooting at him.

Meanwhile Gertrude has reached the house, discovered Jim's peril and has gone for help. She returns with the constable and some armed villagers. They find Jim crouched behind the chimney, seeking shelter from the shots of the gangsters, who are surpised and captured.

Afterwards Jim receives a reward of five thousand dollars for the return of the Remington diamonds, and Howard withdraws his objection to Jim's marriage to Gertrude.

IMP

THE STATUE (Aug. 23).—Mrs. Swell, a lover of fine art, visits the studio of a young sculptor and purchases a life-size statute of Gladiator tableau. The young artist, fearing that his customer may change her mind, hurriedly engages the service of Mike and Jake, two expressmen of unusual eccentricities, to convey the costly statue to the home of his customer.

After carefully instructing the expressmen in the handling of the statue the inexperienced handlers of art fall over the tableau and hopelessly destroy it. The artist, pressed for the need of money, goes into a frenzy, and is only pacified by the possible chance of replacing the tableau by the two expressmen in statue pose. Mike and Jake in sympathy offer their services and are immediately posed for the final inspection of Mr. Swell, who is forced to question his state of mind by the various positions assumed by the Gladiators at different intervals of his inspection. However, he complies with his wife's desire and gives orders for its immediate delivery.

Mike and Jake are crated in statue form and suffer to endure rough usage en route to the Swells' residence. Upon arrival they are met by the artist, who uncrates and poses the expressmen in the well-kept grounds of his purchaser.

A lawn party is given in celebration of the magnificent unshrouding of the statue, and wine and food are plentifully spread before the half-famished statues. At last the temptation becomes unbearable and to the surprise of the entire party the bold Gladiators invade the feast and take their fill, bringing about the exposure of the young sculptor, whose art they had so greatly appraised.

At the police station their voices are raised in protest, but to no avail. An after-scene shows these three serving a like number of years upon the rock pile.

THE LITTLE SKIPPER (Aug. 20).—Old Captain Hardson, tired of seafaring, sells his ship, the Liza Ann, intending to give the money to his two children, Robert and Alice.

Alice is in love with Phil, a young fisherman, and the father threatens her with disinheritance unless she marries the man of his choice, also a skipper and a friend of his. Alice refuses and quietly marries Phil. The old Captain sends her from him, telling her she will never get any of his money.

Some years later, an old shipmate and friend of the Captain dies, leaving his fortune of some $20,000 to the Captain. In the meantime Robert has married Margaret, a society belle. The Captain determines to pay them a visit before giving his fortune to his son, and departs for their home.

Arriving there he receives a very chilly welcome from his daughter-in-law, who sniffs at his pipe and is shocked by his manners. The Captain, on one of his visits to the old wharf, meets two old cronies and invites them home to lunch with him. They reach his son's home to find Robert and Margaret impatiently waiting, and she becomes speechless with rage when the Captain invites the two cronies to sit down at the table with them and passes the grog. She commands her husband to order them out, and leaves the table. Robert, fearing his wife's anger, does as he is bid, and the old Captain leaves, broken-hearted, with his friends.

They wander down to the beach, and while the two old cronies are commiserating with the Captain, he suddenly sees a little boy playing in the water, who, in attempting to rescue his toy sailboat, has overreached and struggles in the deeper water. The Captain rescues the little fellow at his own peril and when he brings him to the shore and hands the boy over to the anxious mother who has come down to look for the lad, he discovers in her his own daughter Alice. WHEN THE BLOOD CALLS (Aug. 20).—A miner, Shaw, with his wife and little boy, Jim, is working a claim in the Sioux country. Jim crawls into the tunnel, while his father is at work, and falls asleep. A band of Sioux attack the miner's cabin, and when he goes to rescue his wife, the Indians kill the father and mother and burn the cabin.

Later, Jim comes out, finds the bodies of his parents, and after burying them as best he can, wanders away. He is found in the woods by little Mona, the daughter of Chief Long Knife, who takes him to the camp. Mona takes a fancy to little Jim, and the Chief adopts him. Jim forgets his white ancestry, and becomes, to all appearances, an Indian, with their customs and manners.

Ten years pass, and Jim and Mona, now grown, are sweethearts. By killing his first bear, unaided, he wins his first Eagle Feather. He is taught the prowess of a Chief, and is looking forward to some great deed by which he may win the right to wear a war bonnet.

A fort has been established in the region, and the Colonel's daughter, against advice, goes alone for a ride. She is captured by Long Knife's band and taken to his camp. There she is tied to a tree, and the Chief tells Jim that here is his chance to win his war bonnet. Here is a paleface for him to torture to death. Jim is elated at his opportunity and advances to begin the torture.

As he is about to strike, his forgotten childhood comes back to him, and he remembers that he and this captive are of the same blood. His Indian training battles with his racial sympathy, but the blood call is too strong and he refuses to torture Alice.

The Indians accuse him of being a coward with the heart of a squaw. They condemn him to wear a squaw's dress and be treated as one. He is made to do squaw's work. Mona's love keeps her faithful to him in spite of his humiliation. Together, they conspire to get Alice away. Jim is sent for water. He slips away and goes to the fort.

Arriving at the fort, he tells the anxious Colonel of his daughter's fate, and leads the soldiers back toward the camp. When near to it, he tells them to wait and slip back into camp with the water he was sent for. The squaws beat him for his long delay, and Mona protects him.

Jim and Mona go to the tepee where Alice is confined. Alice and Mona change clothes, and Jim ties Mona where Alice was. Jim and Alice slip away, but are seen by a squaw, who tells Long Knife his daughter is with the despised coward. Long Knife sends his braves after them, and the Indians and soldiers meet. The Indians are forced to retreat and when they report the result to Long Chief, he rushes to the tepee and stabs Mona (thinking it is Alice), in revenge. When he discovers his mistake, Long Chief stabs himself.

Jim, accompanied by Alice and the Colonel, returns to get Mona, and finds her dying. He carries her out of the tepee. Mona dies, after bidding Alice and Jim farewell. They bury her according to Indian custom, and at her grave the Colonel asks Jim to return to the fort with Alice and himself. But Jim, true to his love for Mona, refuses, preferring death where she lies.

A TIDE IN THE AFFAIRS OF MEN (Aug. 18).—Vivenot, miser, old and helpless, lives in an attic. Little Jessie, daughter of the landlord of the house, is good to him, bringing him food and water. He counts out the money for his purchases from a bag of coin, which he keeps in his closet. In her visits to the attic Jessie has also seen a bag of money and jewels, which he tucks away in a hidden cranny of the chimney. Dying, the old miser names Jessie as his heir, but her father and the lawyer find only a few pennies in the box. These they give to the little girl with the will, jestingly calling her "the little heiress."

Jessie, grown up, married, with a little daughter of her own, is a flood victim. In the wrecks of her household goods she finds the old will. At the same time her husband brings her the news that her childhood home has been condemned as a menace and is to be torn down. A vague recollection of seeing the old miser with a bag in his hand, when she was a child comes to Jessie. She slips away to her old home and searches in the chimney and is attacked by a ghoul, as she triumphantly brings forth the bag. She is rescued by her husband in the desperate struggle that ensues.

Jessie is then made an heiress in very truth.

FLESH OF HIS FLESH (Aug. 23).—"Blood is thicker than water," an old maxim, is again proven.

The fire of love has burned low on the hearth of domestic bliss.

The husband's suit for divorce is granted by the magistrate and the decree is thrice welcome to the indolent wife. Little thought has been given to the child, that symbol of love, until the stern judge awards the custody of the boy to the father. This was an angle the woman had not contemplated, but the ruling had been made and there was no alternative, so after an affectionate farewell, mother and child part. In the woman's heart she has resolved to regain her child so she bides her time, secures the child and departs to the seacoast where she lives a secluded life, but happy in the possession of her only boy.

Years have passed and the father has become the county sheriff—hard and stern—carrying out the mandates of the courts without a tremor in voice or manner.

Visiting the town one day the boy, now a young man, becomes involved in an altercation and in self-defense strikes his antagonist, felling the latter with one blow. The alarm is given and the young man seeks refuge in flight. At the coast he enters his boat and puts to sea; the sheriff and his deputy give chase, but too late to apprehend the man. They follow the direction of the boat along the shore, preventing the boat from effecting a landing. Without food the young man at sea becomes exhausted and, too weak to manipulate the boat, is drifting about aimlessly.

Patiently the expectant mother awaits the return of her son, little dreaming of his dire distress out at sea. Neighbors sight the boat and put out to rescue, returning with the all but dead seaman. The sheriff has watched from a distance and is soon on hand to arrest his man, not knowing his identity.

At the little shack he recognizes the wife and upon inquiry as to their boy is led into the room where the young man, exhausted from hunger and exposure, is being carefully nursed back to life.

The sheriff came to arrest a man—not his son. At the bed of the boy the two estranged hearts are reunited and the almost dead embers of love are fanned back to life to blaze anew until the divine edict "until death doth part" shall be executed.

SAILING UNDER FALSE COLORS (Aug. 21).—This is the story of the cruel parent, the neglected orphan, the tomboy and the unwelcome suitor. The neglected orphan is very much neglected indeed, for her deceased parent has done all he could when he kept her at the convent and had her educated. He died very inconsiderately, just before the story is commenced and he left his daughter his blessing and $200.00 that he got from the sale of a book.

Poor orphan, she was very much undecided what to do, but she had modern business sense and hunted up an employment agency. About this same time the cruel parent, who was not really cruel at all, was wishing that he could control the tomboy, who liked to throw apples at all sorts of things, himself included. The cruel parent decided upon a governess as the only possible solution of the tomboy's disposition. He wired the employment agency for one. The cruel parent had been a customer and the lady boss of the employment bureau is loath to disappoint him. He specifies an elderly woman and she offers the post to the only available old maid, but the proffer is rejected with scorn.

The neglected orphan, witty and wise in her way, suggests that she has the education necessary and can impersonate an aged woman. The lady boss clutches at the straw, and off to the ranch is packed the poor orphan, now rich in the promise of $25.00 a month with room and board free.

The tomboy is much incensed at her presence and mistreats her shamefully, but eventually the orphan wins her over and becomes her confidante. This puts the grand high kibosh on the governess stuff and the cruel parent sees that his idea is not the right one after all. What the tomboy really needs, he thinks, is a mother. He asks the orphan to be one to her, but the orphan has seen the cruel parent actually being cruel to the unwelcome suitor and she decides she will not take the risk just yet of incurring his displeasure. Putting off an answer she agrees to help the tomboy wed the unwelcome suitor, who is not a bit unwelcome to the tomboy. She has determined that her usefulness is ended and has vague thoughts of resigning, a decision which is crystallized into actual effort when the cruel parent catches her false hair and discovers she is really not as old as she looks. But fond persuasions prevail at the last, and the cruel parent agrees to become the charming husband of the orphan, and dear old dad to the tomboy and the unwelcome suitor, now no longer unwelcome. Peace and plenty reign at the ranch after this, and the charming husband changed his mind in regard to what the tomboy needed, as it was a governess after all that tamed her.

THE HARVEST OF FLAME (Aug. 21).—The factory owner's daughter, Pauline, is engaged to the young inspector of factories. At the opening of the story, the factory owner is given notice that on the morrow his factory will be inspected as to safety appliances and compliance with the city fire laws. He, knowing that his factory is painfully deficient, endeavors that evening to bribe the young inspector when the latter calls on Pauline. The inspector very quietly refuses the bribe.

The next morning, when the inspector comes to the factory, the owner tells him that unless a favorable report is made, the engagement of the inspector to Pauline will be broken. The young man is considerably tempted; but when comparing the safety of the lives of hundreds of girls and the happiness of two young people —himself and his fiancee—his conscience will not permit him to hand in any but a truthful report. The owner tenders the inspector the engagement ring, which he accepts, and leaves.

The young foreman of the factory is an inveterate cigarette smoker, and, although he has been severely reprimanded on several occasions by his employer, persists in his habit irrespective of orders. He is just about to light a cigarette when the factory owner, coming from his office where he has just left Pauline in tears, interrupts him. The foreman drops the flaming match and hides his cigarette. The factory owner goes on out, upon a short errand, and in the meantime the match has started a flame of fire in the scraps and cuttings in one of the finishing rooms, that the foreman is unable to put out; and, as the factory owner returns, he finds his factory in flames, most of his employees safe, and realizes that his daughter is trapped in the office behind a wall of flame.

In the meantime the foreman has run out and sent in an alarm to the fire department. He meets the inspector and the two return to the scene of the fire. The factory owner apprises them of Pauline's whereabouts in the burning building, and the foreman, realizing that he has been the cause of it, slinks away. The inspector attempts to go through the door, but is driven back by the flames and at this point, looking up, sees Pauline silhouetted in the window against the roaring flames.

At this window is only a coil of rope—the only fire escape the building boasts. He climbs the rope, lifts Pauline on to his shoulders and climbs down safely to the ground, where they are met by the frenzied father, who receives them with open arms, while the foreman, with grim determination, eschews the further use of cigarettes.

THE IRON TRAIL (Two Reel) (Aug. 19).—William Clifford, the new railroad construction foreman, arrives from the East to superintend the construction of the Santa Fe Railroad upon its first invasion of the West. He arrives at a time when the Indians are on the verge of an uprising—incensed at the intrusion of the iron monster which drives away their wild game and kills their people.

Sly Fox, the young Indian Chief, whose brother is killed by the construction train, visits the construction camp and threatens to exterminate the crew unless they cease further work. Alarmed at this attitude, Clifford sends for Crandall, the superintendent. Crandall, upon receiving the news, immediately starts for the construction camp and on the way meets with an accident. Fearing the injury may prove fatal, he sends for his wife and daughter.

In the meantime, Sly Fox, who is in love with Starlight, a beautiful Indian maid, tries to force her to his will and threatens her with death unless she consents. He is prevented from killing her by the timely arrival of Clifford, who is out inspecting the new road. With the assistance of several cowboys, who are on their way to the camp with a herd of horses for construction work, Sly Fox is taken prisoner. One of the cowboys volunteers to take Sly Fox to the fort, while the rest continue their way to the construction camp with the horses.

Hawanna, who is in love with Sly Fox, with Indian cunning succeeds in shooting the cowboy and liberating Sly Fox. Enraged at the white man's interference, Sly Fox returns to the Indian camp and incites the tribe to an attack on the white men, with the purpose of driving them away. Starlight, who has overheard their plans, rides out to warn the white men.

She first rides to the construction camp, where they make immediate preparations for defense, and have barely succeeded in getting on the train, with the intention of leaving camp, when the Indians attack. The Indians follow the train out, and a running fight ensues. The engineer is shot, and as he falls with his hand on the lever, stops the train. Clifford goes forward to take his place, and before the train is again started, the Indians succeed in setting fire to the box car, in which Crandall, his wife and daughter are secreted. The explosives used in construction work are also contained in the box car, and when the fire is finally discovered, the train is brought to a stop. Crandall and his family are taken out, and the box car is uncoupled, and just as the train starts away from it, a terrific explosion follows.

In the meantime Starlight has ridden to the garrison and also to the neighboring ranch and notified the soldiers and the cowboys that the Indians are on the war path and attacking the construction crew. They immediately start out, meeting on the road, and finding the construction camp deserted, follow the path of the track and come to the timely rescue of the party just as the Indians have them completely at their mercy. Starlight, who has followed with the cowboys, is wounded in the skirmish. When she regains consciousness, she attempts to crawl to safety across the railroad tracks, but falls exhausted on the tracks just as the train comes along on its way back to the camp. Clifford sees her from the engine. He crawls out on the pilot of the engine, and just as the train nears her, lifts Starlight to safety.

A HONEYMOON HOAX (Aug. 5).—Leonard Smith and his bride set out for their honeymoon, Nancy's father and mother attending their departure by automobile for the ancient city of Tours. Just before the start Nancy's mother states that she will call up the couple at ten that evening, by which time they should have arrived at the Grand Hotel, Tours.

On the road an unfortunate breakdown occurs, and by courtesy of a passing motorist the loving couple are carried back a short distance to the nearby town of Blois. They decide to stay at the Blois Hotel until their car shall be repaired, and Leonard Smith telegraphs to his bride's parents announcing the fact, and also to the Grand Hotel, Tours, informing the manager that he may let room 16 for that night.

Meanwhile things have been happening in Tours. Just previous to the receipt of Smith's wire a saucy-looking drummer has asked for a room, only to be informed that all the rooms are engaged. Smith's telegram, however, releases room 16 and our commercial friend is duly ushered into the bridal chamber. He quickly orders the room cleared of all wedding knickknacks and prepares for slumber. At 10 o'clock he is aroused by a terrific ring on the telephone, and on answering same learns that the parents of the bridal couple are calling from Paris. What an opportunity for some fun! An opportunity not to be missed! Therefore he first imitates the bride's voice when talking to her mother, and afterwards the bridegroom's when conversing with the father. His replies scandalize the doting parents and they are in a terrible fright until the receipt of Leonard's telegram puts them at their ease, and later we see the dear old folks lying in bed dreaming lovely dreams of their grandchildren-to-be.

SHOOING THE WOOER (Aug. 7).—Gerald King, a "masher" of advancing years, rides on the platform of a street car one morning and insists upon talking to pretty little Suzanne, a post-office clerk. He follows her to the Martinville post-office and discovers in what department she is engaged and also finds out her name. Gerald then asks at the general delivery window for letters which he knows cannot be waiting for him, but whilst he excites the admiration of an elderly lady customer, his efforts at enchanting the lovely Suzanne meet with scant success. In fact, he becomes such a nuisance that Suzanne only rids herself of him by slamming the window upon his fingers.

Gerald, however, is pachydermous as an elephant, and will not accept rebuff. He goes home and calls up on the 'phone in order to renew his protestations of eternal affection, but is again frustrated in his amorous intentions. Yet another idea occurs to the wily one, and he mails a blank sheet of paper addressed to himself at the Martinville general delivery. Gerald's valet has been awaiting an opportunity to "put one over" on his employer, and here occurs his chance. The valet calls at the post-office an hour before the impressionable Gerald and fixes up a fine "josh" with Suzanne, whereby Gerald will be made to appear even more foolish than nature made him.

So when Gerald again calls for his mail he finds Suzanne's face wreathed in smiles. She reaches for his letter, drops it, leaves her lily-white hand on the counter, which, when Gerald proceeds to stroke it fondly, is quickly changed for that of a burly mail-carrier, who demands in fierce accents an explanation of Gerald's motive in placing a bunch of violets in the aforementioned burly fist. Gerald retires, disgusted, but is recalled by the smiling Suzanne, who hands him the forgotten letter. Seeing that his letter has been opened, he hopes to find a loving note therein from Suzanne; he gets, however, this message: "There is no fool like an old fool." And looking up from the reading of this proverb, he espies Suzanne and her fellow clerks derisively laughing at him through the post-office window.

THE POISONED DAGGER (Aug. 15).—Returning from a voyage to the East, a sailor distributes presents among his friends. To his fiancee he gives a gaudily colored shawl, and to her father he makes a present of a quaint knife of Oriental manufacture. The arrival of the sailor entirely ruins the hopes of Claude Baker, a village lad who aspires to the hand of Dolly, the daughter of an old miner. Dolly prefers the sailor, and Claude is greatly enraged. When the old miner descends the mine the rope attached to the cage is cut and he is hurled several feet into the depths below. The affair is a mystery until Claude Baker comes forward with a knife he found near the scene of the outrage. The knife is identified, and suspicion falls immediately upon the sailor, who is arrested. Just as the police are about to remove their prisoner Claude Baker is seized with dreadful pains and, as he expires, confesses his guilt. It is then found that he has cut himself with the dagger, which he used to cut the rope. Thus the biter is bit, for the dagger has been dipped in a deadly poison, the existence of which is only known to the denizens of the mysterious Far East.

NEW FAMOUS PLAYERS POLICY APPROVED

The Famous Players Film Company's announcement last week to the effect that beginning September 1st, it would release three feature productions a month of the same standard maintained in the past, is being generally and favorably commented upon. Interpreting the majority of opinions, this extension of Famous Players activities was anticipated.

Inquiries from every state in the country still pour in to the Mutual Film Corporation for terms and bookings on the "Battle of Gettysburg." This five-reel masterpiece of the New York Motion Picture Corporation is now "packing them in" at the Crescent Theatre, Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Bronx Theatre, New York City, both Keith houses. In the largest theatres of the foremost cities in the United States it is booked as a headliner feature and fully living up to its billing. Kessel & Baumann have given the public and exhibitors one of the most pretentious films of the season and their efforts and those of Thos. H. Ince, who produced the picture, are meeting with enthusiastic approval from the press and public of the country.

"Doc" Willet, who, in his working hours, bears the title of superintendent of the New York Motion Picture Corporation laboratories, will tell you that "automobiling is no business." "Doc" was hurrying Bert Ennis in his fast little Buick on Saturday last to keep an urgent appointment. They were proceeding "leisurely" through Prospect Park when a courteous motor-cop held them up and handed "Doc" a neatly worded little invitation to appear in the Adams Street Court on Monday morning and "tell it to the judge." "And we were only doing thirty-five an hour," says "Doc." Ask Bert about that political pull of his.

While the historic picture play of "Nathan Hale" was being shown, a little girl was so overcome with the tragic fate of the martyr spy that she burst out crying; upon which her mother tried to console her by saying: "Don't cry, dearie—it'll all turn out right in the end. It always does in moving pictures, you know."

"Historic Trenton" was recently filmed in Kinemacolor showing all the statues and relics of Revolutionary times, in contrast with scenes of modern progress. The conclusion shows the Boy Scouts crossing the Delaware at the point where George Washington made his famous ferry trip to give the Hessians a surprise party. The pictures were shown to the amateur actors therein at the State Street Theatre on the following day.

Moving Picture News,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir: A young man, representing himself as Jack Wright, of the Jerome H. Remick Music House, has been working among the moving picture theatres in Michigan and adjoining states. His game is to take orders at $2.00 each, for which he agrees to send professional copies of new publications, three each week for one year.

We wish to advise the theatre proprietors and musicians in general that this party has no connection whatever with our house and nobody in our employ is authorized or instructed to make any such arrangements, so Jack Wright is simply a swindler. We understand that another music publishing house is being used in the same way under another name, but so far we have heard from about twenty people who have been victimized by this man. All of them, with the exception of two, are connected with theatres in Michigan.

The last report that came to us regarding the whereabouts of Jack Wright was from Eau Claire, Wis. He has also worked Saginaw, Mich., to a finish.

We wish you would run an article regarding this matter in your next issue so that your readers will be on the lookout for this party and can notify us if they should come in contact with him. We are anxious to have this man arrested and will prosecute him, if it is possible.

Yours very truly,
Jerome H. Remick & Co.

OPERATORS' CHAT

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC., LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—J. A. LeRoy.
Office—133 Third Avenue.
Telephone—Stuyvesant 619

OUR MOTTO—ONE FOR ALL, ALL FOR ONE

The next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will be on Monday, August 18, 1913, at 12 p.m. at the meeting rooms, Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street.

* * * *

The meeting on Monday, August 4, 1913, of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 was attended by 200 members, the last obligation of new members took place, ten new members were admitted. The books being closed, no more applications will be received until further notice. Regular routine of business was quickly transacted and reports of various committees read and accepted. President Robert Goldblatt made a few remarks of intense interest to the members and during his speech was interrupted by applause on several occasions. The meeting closed at 4 a.m.

* * * *

The arrangements committee of the recent moonlight excursion are to be congratulated on their efforts to make the affair a success, for Boos, Freedman and Gertler worked like beavers to bring the affair to a successful conclusion.

* * * *

The moonlight excursion which took place on Saturday, August 2, 1913, was attended by about 1,000 people. An enjoyable time was had by all, dancing began at 9 p.m. and was indulged in until daylight. Caberet artists helped to pass the time away with music and song. A feature of the occasion was the Operators' Misery Quartet, who proved themselves excellent singers; one of the members of the quartet, Brother Jack Tillman, broke all records by playing a harmonica five hours, giving all the latest rags and popular opera selections. Brothers Frank MacDonald and Harry Volmer also could go some when it came to the song thing. The boat landed at 6 a.m. and everyone went home thoroughly satisfied that an enjoyable time was had.

* * * *

There is one feature of the moonlight excursion that is worthy of remark, and that is, the members of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 are to be congratulated on the behavior of the boys, because when liquid refreshments are served on any occasion they partake only moderately, and during the entire time on the boat not one member of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 was under the influence of liquor. A more sober bunch of boys will be hard to find than we have in this organization. A man cannot be a booze fighter and be a good operator.

* * * *

The writer has received several letters endorsing last week's remarks in the Chat in regard to the Union label, and trusts that all Union men are of the same opinion and will act accordingly.

* * * *

Why is it that during the heated term the owners and managers of the moving picture theatres, when business gets slack, start to cut expenses and the very first man whose salary they try to cut is the operator's? Mr. Manager, don't you realize that this is a wrong proceeding. You don't gain anything by such methods of false economy; the operator is really the mainstay of the moving picture theatre, and, Mr. Manager, when you start to cut his salary you only "cut off your nose to spite your face," and gain nothing by it in the long run.

Notice: To members of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 who are unable to attend meetings and are in arrears with dues, etc., don't forget that the office is open every day from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and the business representative accepts your dues as usual. Get wise that you must be paid up to be in good standing when the reorganization takes place or you are not eligible to membership if your card is not up to date and clear.

J. A. LEROY, Business Representative.

SELIG NOTES

It seems like only a short time since the name Filson and Errol was one of the best to conjure with in the realm of vaudeville. They began with Tony Pastor and they ended up as "top-liners" in the bright lights that limn the porte cocheres in front of the modern vaudeville palaces. They were the first to produce Geo. Cohan's premier sketch "The Tip on the Darby" at the old Star Theatre in New York, which gave the author so many modern successes, parts of the several millions that he has since accumulated. They used to end up their season prematurely early in Chicago so that Al Filson could get back to his farm over at old St. Joe, Mich. He also struck oil in Oklahoma, which helped him along, but while he retired from the stage, he felt the lure of moving pictures and some while ago stopped orange farming in California to join the Selig Company. Now his wife, Lea Errol, has joined him in the same organization and they will reproduce some of their famous vaudeville sketches together at the big plant in Los Angeles, Cal.

* * * *

Among the new additions to the Selig Stock Company at Edendale, Cal., are Joseph King, W. K. Rhyno, Norval MacGregor, and Miss Mabel Van Buren. The last named lady was formerly associated with Kinemacolor. Edw. J. (Jack) Le Saint, formerly leading actor well known to theatre patrons and late director for Kinemacolor, has joined the Selig forces.

* * * *

Professor Frederick Starr and Roy F. Barton, the former of the Chicago University, and the latter formerly associated with the United States Reclamation Service in the Philippines, last week started from Chicago for the Pacific Coast and thence direct to the Philippines, where they expect to devote their time during the next year to collecting and pictorializing for the Selig Polyscope Company. They will send trees, plants and wild animals as well as make moving picture films, quaint and characteristic scenes in our far island possessions.

Dr. E. B. McDowell, now in Rome, who has been laboring in the Far East for a few years past for the Selig Company, has sent forward many rare specimens of botanical wonders from China, Japan and India, that have already found a place in the Selig Wild Animal Farm near Los Angeles.

Dr. Francis B. Von Teuber, a well-known scientist and geographer, is now exclusively in the Selig service and last week touched at Jamaica on his way to South America, where he is to head extensive explorations along the Amazon from the mouth to its source.

CURRENT COMMENT

UNCLE SAM'S SOLDIER-ACTORS

The military reservation at Fort Riley has been temporarily turned into an open-air motion picture "studio," and the thousand or more soldiers stationed at the post are posing before the camera for a set of films that are being made by Major Dickson, chaplain of the Sixth Field Artillery. The experiments in placing the army on films has been pronounced a complete success. Practically every officer and soldier in the garrison witnessed the projection of 2,000 feet of film last week. Most of the men had taken part in the pictures and their projection before this exclusive audience of soldier-actors was really in the way of a final rehearsal to determine if any improvements could be made. The consensus of opinion was that the films were the finest military pictures that have ever been produced.

At the opening of the exhibition Chaplain Dickson explained to the audience that the scenes were not complete and would not be ready for public inspection for several months. The first on the screen was a battery of horse artillery approaching a freight train for the purpose of loading guns and munitions. Well-developed artillerymen swung from their horses and ran field guns up the ramps and on to the flat cars with a perfection of discipline that made the entire scene look like a vast piece of machinery.

This scene was followed by pictures of battery horse artillery at war strength, in the field and passing in double section before the camera. This large organization, composed of nearly 200 men and over 200 horses, went on the screen very much as it would appear to the eye. It was followed by some fifty scenes, presenting a maze of men, horses and guns, which caused the audience to burst out in frequent applause. * * *

Several scenes from another film, "Modern Warfare," that Major Dickson is preparing, were shown. Cossack posts, relays of horses and a cavalry force dismounted and fighting on foot were some of the pictures. An exceptional photographic feat was the taking of scenes from the championship polo game between the Mounted Service School and Sixth Field Artillery teams, held recently at Fort Riley.

Every person in these pictures was an officer or soldier of the regular army. It was a masterly, dignified presentation of the American soldier as he really is. Major Dickson is working up these films under the immediate direction of the military authorities at Fort Riley, and is endeavoring to truthfully portray the American Army on the motion-picture screen.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

EDUCATIONAL FILMS IN EUROPE

The use of moving pictures in the schools is spreading rapidly in Europe. Recently a professor in a Brussels school excited great interest by presenting a series of pictures illustrating the progress of aviation from the earliest days to the present. In Prussia the minister of public instruction has approved the use of the Cinematograph in all the higher schools of the country, and the official programs give lists of films for geography, history and science. The expense of this material is met by appropriations from the government and municipalities and by private subscriptions.—Gloucester (Mass.) Times.

ITALIAN CENSORSHIP

The Italian Government has planned a stricter supervision of motion pictures in Italy and levying a tax on Cinematographic productions. A bill has recently been introduced in the Italian Chamber of Deputies by the Minister of Finance providing for a tax of 10 centesimi ($0.0193) per linear meter (3.28 feet) of film (imported as well as that of domestic production). The bill also provides for a censorship of motion pictures which are to be produced in Italy, prohibiting films portraying pictures distasteful or contrary to public decency and morality, especially those reproducing scenes of cruelty, etc., or which might be an incentive to crime.

The establishment of this censorship in all Italy will no doubt necessitate the purchase of a large number of motion picture machines by the public authorities for censoring films, and presents a possible trade opportunity for American manufacturers of motion picture machines. —Report of U. S. Consul at Genoa.

FILM TEST FOR CHAUFFEURS

Motion pictures seem destined to have a repressing influence on recklessness and crime. Professor Munsterberg's invention—the Cinematograph nerve test for chauffeurs, pilots and other men in charge of passenger and traffic conveyances—places the candidate in a motor car in a dark room before a moving picture. A child in the picture darts before him; a team dashes directly toward him; a heap of rock suddenly appears. In every case the would-be chauffeur must act immediately; his steadiness or unsteadiness of nerve is plainly revealed. It should be remembered that such a test is as realistic as life itself; so real was the dog in a recent picture at Brenham, Tex., that a dog in the house dashed at him and tore the screen to pieces.—World's Work.

RECRUITS SECURED BY "MOVIES"

Recruiting for the United States army by means of moving picture exhibitions showing the soldier's life is proposed by Major R. S. Croxton, U. S. A.

He has set forth his proposals in an article in the Infantry Journal. It has attracted much attention at the war department and is viewed with great favor by many officers.

Major Croxton maintains that the "movies" will get for the United States army more and better men at much less cost than is possible under the present methods of recruiting. He believes that traveling moving picture shows will be more efficient.

Motion picture companies are making films of all of the activities of the Federal Forest Service, including planting, cutting timber, patrol, and lookout work. Already at least two fire-fighting "movies" are being exhibited.

* * * *

Judge John C. Fehlandt, of the municipal court at Madison, Wis., ruled the other day that the motion picture theatres may remain open Sundays without fear of arrest if pictures of a religious character or which the court might rule as morally uplifting are displayed and a percentage of the receipts given to charity. District-Attorney Nelson announced he will enforce the ruling to the letter.

NEW YORK STATE BRANCH NO. 11 OF THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA HOLD CONVENTION AT SYRACUSE

Elect Officers for a Period of Sixty Days and Will Hold Convention at Rochester, N. Y., on October 15.h and 16th

At the Yates Hotel, Syracuse, N. Y., Monday, August 11, 1913, Mr. M. A. Neff, national presiden., called the meeting to order and explained that on account of the voting of the delegates at the New York convention, the positions of a number of the officers were vacated, and that it was imperative for us to fill the vacancies caused by the voting of the delegates at the late New York convention, and also suggested that an election of officers for a period of sixty days be made. This was made into a motion and carried, and the nomination and election of officers then took place. The following were unanimously elected:

National vice-president, Mr. W. E. Wilkinson, of Syracuse, N. Y.; president, Mr. A. W. Wolff, of Rochester, N. Y.; first vice-president, Charles P. Smith, Syracuse, N. Y.; second vice-president, Mr. Frank C. Pierce, Geneva, N. Y.; secretary, Frank E. Samuels, New York City.

On account of Mr. Davis, the state treasurer, not walking out with the other delegates of the convention, he had not been suspended by the national body, but he was not present at our meeting, and as we have had no reports from him, it was legally moved and seconded, and unanimously carried, that the office of treasurer be declared vacant. The nomination for treasurer then took place, and Mr. W. C. Hubbard, of Rochester, N. Y., was nominated and unanimously elected treasurer; sergeant-at-arms, Mr. John Mullaney, New York City; counsellor of the state, Tobias A. Keppler, New York City.

Legislative committee elected: Mr. Day, of Auburn, N. Y.; Mr. Lux, of Utica, N. Y.; Mr. H. L. Fox, of Binghamton, N. Y.

The following chairmen of different committees were appointed by Mr. Neff with the privilege of appointing their own membership committee: On Law, Tobias A. Keppler; Grievance Committee, Mr. F. W. Esterheld, Rochester, N. Y.; Membership Committee, George A. Langa, Syracuse, N. Y.; Publicity Committee, E. W. Logan, Syracuse, N. Y.; Constitution and By-Laws, John Mullaney; Poster Committee, R. L. Macnabb.

On account of the fact that the New York State League has had no Constitution and By-Laws adopted by themselves, it was unanimously agreed that the Ohio Constitution and By-Laws should be adopted until the next meeting, at which time we will proceed to adopt the Constitution and By-Laws for New York State.

A motion was made and carried unanimously that the next convention be held at Rochester, N. Y., on Wednesday and Thursday, October 15 and 16, 1913. It was then resolved that the New York State Branch No. 11 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America in convention assembled hereby endorse the actions and work of the National Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and its officers.

Resolved that the New York State Branch No. 11 recognize New York City Local No. 1 as the League Affiliated Local of New York City, designated as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Board of Trade of New York City, Inc. Sidney Ascher, president, and Frank E. Samuels, secretary.

A telegram from Mr. H. L. Fox, of Binghamton, N. Y., was read stating that Binghamton Local No. 8 had started a delegation for Syracuse and had missed the train, but was loyal to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Utica was reported as loyal to the League. Rochester, loyal to the man, and every member of the Rochester local was present at the convention.

Moving Picture News, New York City.

Gentlemen: Through the courtesy of the management of the Imperial Hotel, Twenty-second street and Broadway, the Local No. 1, New York State Branch No. 11, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will make the Imperial Hotel their headquarters from now on, and their next regular monthly meeting will be held at the above hotel on next Monday, August 18th, at 11 o'clock a. m.

Trusting that as many of the exhibitors as can find it convenient to attend will be present, as a great deal of interest to them will be brought up at this meeting, I remain,

Yours very respectfully,
F. E. SAMUELS, Secretary.

NEW YORK STATE EXHIBITORS AFFILIATED WITH THE NEW INTERNATIONAL MOTION PICTURE ASSOCIATION ALSO HOLD CONVENTION AT SYRACUSE

A meeting of the State Executive Board of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of New York was held at the Yates Hotel, Syracuse, N. Y., on Monday, the 11th, with all the state executive officers in attendance. It was decided to entirely sever all relations with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

This decision was embodied in a resolution to the effect that "this organization be known as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York State." The following state officers will continue in office:

President, Samuel H. Trigger, New York; first vice-president, B. E. Cornell, Syracuse; second vice-president, H. L. Fox, Binghamton; secretary, William A. Douque, Utica; treasurer, John C. Davis, Saugerties; chairman of the Executive Committee, J. B. Friedman, Buffalo.

There was an attendance comprising the officers of the various locals in the state of New York, consisting of Albany, Schenectady, Utica, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Oswego, Binghamton and New York City. After pledging fidelity to Mr. Trigger and the new International Motion Picture Association, and making plans for organizing new locals throughout the state, the delegates went to the city hall where motion pictures were made of the group descending the steps of the building.

Mary Fuller, Augustus Phillips, Walter Edwin and the other Edison players in Maine are combining hard work with a great deal of fun. Miss Fuller has her own saddle horse and divides all her spare time between riding and swimming. One film under preparation required that Miss Fuller learn to sail a boat and when it became known, every male in Belfast from the age of sixteen to fifty placed his boat and his vast experience at her disposal. As a result Miss Fuller has added sailing to her long list of accomplishments.

THE KINEMACOLOR OF AMERICA

Manager Sawyer Explains the Patents Company License, and Talks Interestingly of Kinemacolor Matters All Along the Line

You know about the smiling young lady of Niger who took a ride on the back of a tiger. You know also what the result was on their return—the smile was on the face of the tiger. Well, that's not exactly what happened in the moving picture arena recently.

To be sure the Kinemacolor Company of America has been gathered into the fold of the Motion Picture Patents Company, but there's a smile all along the line. In the course of a chat with Arthur H. Sawyer, manager of the Kinemacolor Company of America, the cause of the "smile that won't come off" was duly set forth.

"Yes," said Mr. Sawyer, "we have entered into a contract, according to which the Kinemacolor Company is duly licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company to manufacture and exhibit Kinemacolor moving pictures in the United States. This contract straightens out a condition of affairs that was very unsatisfactory to all concerned, and is of considerable importance to the whole moving picture trade. Hitherto there were many exhibitors who wished to run Kinemacolor pictures, but were afraid of losing licenses. Some of the larger exhibitors, like, Proctor, Fox, and others, defied the consequences and continued to run our natural color motion pictures as features or vaudeville acts, but many other exhibitors dared not take the risk of displeasing the Patents Company for fear of losing their licensed pictures. Thus exhibitors, generally, will be pleased with the new arrangement, which enables them to run Kinemacolor and licensed pictures on the same program. Kinemacolor pictures may now be shown in any licensed or independent theatre."

"And how about distribution?" was asked by the News representative?"

"There is no change in our method of distribution. The general management of the business in this country will be conducted in New York, as formerly, at the executive offices in the Mecca Building. The distributing offices for New England are at Providence, R. I., and those for the Middle West are in Chicago. The distributing offices for Ohio, Eastern Pennsylvania and some of the Southern States are at Cincinnati. That the demand for colored motion pictures is constantly growing is evidenced by an important contract we have just closed with Jake Wells, who has become a confirmed convert to the box-office prosperity that is brought about by the exhibition of feature films. He is now a most enthusiastic picture fan."

"What is the nature of his contract with your company?"

"His contract practically gives him the exclusive handling of Kinemacolor in the cities and states in the South in which he has theatres or affiliations. It is part of Mr. Wells' plans to handle the Kinemacolor productions for the entire Southern section of the country. The Kinemacolor pictures are to be used in connection with the special features in black and while that Mr. Wells and his associates are buying from time to time. The first installations of the Kinemacolor machines begin the week of August 25th and the Southern states will be supplied as rapidly as machines can be supplied to the different points.

"On August 25th a new form of entertainment consisting of about thirty minutes of Kinemacolor as the headliner and about one hour of a black-and-white feature and miscellaneous subjects, will be introduced in Wells' theatres at Atlanta, Birmingham, Savannah, Norfolk and Richmond. Starting from Richmond, the films will play through the different towns on the circuit, being booked and advertised the same as a road production."

"Will there be vaudeville acts in connection with the entertainment?"

"No; the entertainment which will last from an hour and a half to an hour and three-quarters, will be devoted entirely to moving pictures, with three changes of program each week. There will be one, two and three-reel features in black and white, and also one, two and three-reel Kinemacolor features. The colored pictures will comprise, in addition to dramatic and comedy features, various scenic, industrial and educational subjects of popular interest. Think of the possibilities of a traveling show of this character, which will only have to carry an operator and a musician. It will take in towns that come under the head of one and two-night stands, and the entertainment will be given in such towns once in every four or eight weeks, according to the patronage and size of the population. Thus Jake Wells may be said to be the pioneer of the traveling moving picture show."

"How long have you been exhibiting Kinemacolor pictures in this country?"

"America had its first public view of this wonderful invention in the summer of 1910, when the Kinemacolor pictures of the funeral of King Edward VII were shown. Successive exhibitions of the coronation of King George V and Queen Mary in 1911, the Durbar in 1912, the Making of the Panama Canal and the Balkan War scenes in 1913 proved the supremacy of Kinemacolor in reproducing great pageants and historic events in all their magnificent colors.

"The majority of exhibitors know of these great picture pageants—the first 'feature films' to play the regular theatres—but they are not familiar with the wonderful assortment of dramatic and comedy subjects, and miscellaneous travel, educational, scientific, topical and trick pictures, now supplied in our regular Kinemacolor film service.

"Kinemacolor features like 'Steam'—showing the development of this power from the tea-kettle to the modern 100-ton locomotive; 'Nathan Hale,' the life story of the heroic young martyr of the American Revolution; Nathaniel Hawthorne's famous American romance, 'The Scarlet Letter,' and Robert Louis Stevenson's thrilling story, 'Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde,'—have been the sensations of the season wherever exhibited. The old English morality play, 'Everyman,' has been reproduced with wonderful scenic effects, while a number of big dramatic spectacles are being produced in England and France by the consolidated Kinemacolor acting companies."

"Has 'Everyman' been released in this country?"

"It was released recently for production in a California theatre, but it won't be released in the East till the last week in August or the first week in September."

"What important features have you under way?"

"Our studios in Los Angeles and in Europe are working at high pressure to turn out what is under way for picture releases. For instance, there are the films depicting the daily life at the Vatican. Charles Urban, as you know, had the honor of giving the first Kinemacolor entertainment with these films at the Vatican, and the Pope was so greatly pleased that he ordered the representation to be repeated at an early date. These films include the Pilgrimage to Lourdes, the Blessing of the Sea at Malta, and the Papal Benediction of the people. Other feature plays that we are at work on are 'William Tell' and 'In the Days of Robin Hood.'"

"Is your production of 'William Tell' based on Schiller's drama?"

"In the main incidents it follows Schiller's dramatization of the historical or legendary incidents. The Kinemacolor pictures were taken under the expert direction of J. de Frenes, a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, in accordance with our arrangement to make a permanent record of the pastoral version of 'William Tell' as it is presented annually by Swiss peasants and produced by the citizens of Interlaken. Some of the scenes were cinematographed on the pastoral stage at Interlaken, while others are reproductions of actual Swiss scenery. The Rutli scene, for instance, is the reproduction of a natural setting that was found way up in Rugen Park."

"Were the 'Robin Hood' films also prepared abroad?"

"Yes; they were prepared by the English Kinemacolor Company, and will be released in this country in the early fall. I feel confident that exhibitors and audiences will be delighted with the 'Robin Hood' production. There is not a false move on the part of the players. They were carefully selected from the best actors and actresses in England. Every character of the legend—Will Scarlet, Maid Marion, Little John, Friar Tuck, Robin Hood—all of them are presented as if 'to the manner born.' The natural color pictures were taken in the famous Sherwood Forest, and will compare with anything in the line of natural scenery that has ever been thrown on the screen. The interior settings are also reproduced with wonderful effect, and the throne room scene will make audiences sit up and take notice. The costumes of the period are most picturesque. The music has been carefully gleaned from operatic and other available sources, and exhibitors will be provided with a piano score that provides suitable selections for every scene."

"Do you provide music with other feature films?"

"We have decided to adopt that policy. I think that suitable musical selections are a most important consideration in artistic productions. We shall furnish piano scores for 'William Tell,' for 'Everyman,' and in every instance when good music will add to the attractiveness of the performance, for it is just as necessary in motion pictures to appeal to the ear with effective results as it is to satisfy the eye. This is especially the case in romantic and historical photoplays. If music 'hath charms to sooth the savage breast,' it must be effective otherwise the savage might howl with anguish and turn upon the perpetrator of discordant sounds.'

"Do you anticipate any great improvements on present methods of presenting feature plays?"

"I don't know of any special improvement—except possibly that the sub-title ought not to be resorted to when the incidents can be made clear by pantomime. I might illustrate this by saying that while I don't understand French I have attended performances given by a fine company of French players and understood every incident of the plot from start to finish, although I knew nothing about the play before the performance. It's the old story of the poor workman quarreling with his tools. Dramatists have learned to avoid the aside on the speaking stage, and in time they will overcome the unnecessary use of the sub-title in the silent drama."

"But you consider the sub-title necessary to some extent, don't you?"

"Yes, the problem has not been solved for plays that don't lend themselves easily to pantomime—that is, plays in which you cannot convey everything by action, facial expression and gestures. Possibly the 'talking' pictures may be made more effective some day. Then again, instead of sub-titles they may substitute a lecturer for important productions, as they do now for educational films on the lecture platform and in educational and scientific institutions. It would not be feasible to have lecturers for the cheap moving picture houses, but the necessary explanations might be made by means of phonographs. Nevertheless, there is no question that the public are satisfied with things as they are. So long as the pictures sustain interest and draw audiences it is just as well to leave well enough alone. A poor lecturer and a poor phonograph would not improve matters in the cheaper houses, but they certainly might brace up on the quality of music supplied by many of the exhibitors in the cheaper houses throughout the country."

"Do you supply explanatory notes for exhibitors that print programs?"

"Yes, we send descriptions of the Kinemacolor features ten days in advance, so that the exhibitors can post themselves as well as their audiences in regard to coming films. These descriptions are accompanied by suggestions for suitable musical selections. In the case of the important features, as I have already told you, we supply a piano score of appropriate selections, which the exhibitor can have orchestrated if he sees fit. The descriptive notes of our program enable the exhibitor to supply the local newspapers with advance notices. It is only a question of time when the local newspapers throughout the country will carry advertisements of moving picture attractions just as extensively as they now carry the advertisements of the performances on the speaking stage. They will also have regular reviews of multiple feature plays, as they must necessarily follow the public demand. Columns, as you know, have been written about 'Quo Vadis,' 'The Scarlet Letter,' 'Nathan Hale,' and similar photoplays and the Sunday papers have published elaborate descriptive articles and numerous illustrations of photoplays of this character. Even now a number of daily papers in this country devote a great deal of space to a motion picture department."

"Tell me something about the invention of your colored pictures."

"Kinemacolor is the invention of Charles Urban and G. Albert Smith, of England. The first presentation of these actual color pictures was in London on May 1, 1908—over five years ago. The films are sensitized by a chemical process so that when exposed they absorb every tinge of color. When these films are projected through a color filter attached to a moving picture machine, the colors are reproduced on the screen in all their natural beauty. It has been our policy to furnish for each entertainment an experienced operator and a complete Kinemacolor equipment including an asbestos booth for the machine. Owing to the demand for good operators we have opened a free school recently to teach operators the proper method of handling the Kinemacolor films. Frank Scott is the principal instructor and Walter Smith is his chief assistant. With the aid of our new color filter our operators will be taught the method by which our natural color pictures are perfectly projected on the same amperage required for the black-and-white."

"Have you any competitors in the moving picture amusement field?"

"Not so you could notice it. A French concern attempted to invade the amusement field in England. A London manager advertised that he would give a joint exhibit of Kinemacolor pictures and pictures of the French concern and requested the public to come to the performance and judge which they liked best. The French concern has not been heard of since in the English theatres. In the scenic field Kinemacolor has always been supreme, and now that it has gone into the production of American photoplays, pictorial dramas of human interest, acted by American players, it has equaled, if not excelled, the most ambitious attempts in black-and-white. We have now over 200 two- and three-reel dramatic and comedy subjects ready for service. Our list includes such popular photoplays as 'The House on the Plains,' 'War and Peace,' 'Fisherman's Luck,' 'The Husband's Story,' 'Jack and the Beanstalk,' 'An American Invasion,' 'Pearls of the Madonna,' 'The House that Jack Built,' 'Fifty-miles from Tombstone,' 'Girl Worth Having,' 'As the Candle Burns,' 'There is a God,' 'Romance of Princess Romana,' 'The Call of the Blood,' 'Her Crowning Glory,' 'When a Woman Wills,' 'Mumps,' 'Mixed Signals,' 'The Better Success,' 'The Return of the Prodigals,' and others. Among the strong features of our program are the fashions which are shown to audiences very often weeks in advance of the arrival in this country of the gowns and millinery creations of Parisian design. But you've certainly made me talk a lot. The color picture is not only a business but a fad with me. Kinemacolor is a sort of artist's dream come true. It is the greatest amusement triumph of our generation. No longer do we have to go traveling to see the world. Kinemacolor brings the world to us. It is Nature's mirror, and reproduces all her colors, tints and shades. Even the color of eyes, hair and complexion are reflected. Things are shown on the screen just as they really are. At the present time Kinemacolor photographers are located in practically every country on the globe."

EASTERN FEATURE FILM COMPANY MOVE TO LARGER OFFICES

The Eastern Feature Film Company of New York, Inc., have taken offices at 835 Broadway, corner of Thirteenth street. Mr. S. Friedman, manager of the New York office, says they will lease one feature each week. The company also contemplates moving the Boston branch from 224 Tremont street, which is managed by Herman Rifkin, when suitable offices can be obtained.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

PROMISES are good; performances better; mutually satisfactory results best.

* * * *

Our advertisers and readers are with us; others may be but their support is of little, if any, real value. Talk is cheap. Advertising pays—you and us.

* * * *

Inquiry has been made for the future policy of this newspaper—easy to answer. Help us to help you and us and it will be done; neglect us and we will not reflect your interests.

* * * *

Our columns are open to all for anything in the way of fair and proper comment or criticism having reference to the moving picture business. Include correct name and address or its fate is the wastebasket.

* * * *

What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If the exhibitors organize a trust won't they look ridiculous under federal prosecution? The manufacturers have been forced before the bar of justice. Still, turn about is fair play.

* * * *

Just think of it! There is a rumor in circulation that another moving picture trade paper is to be started. Good for the printer; besides it keeps money in circulation and administers stinging experience. How many issues do you suppose it will put out?

* * * *

The trade should observe moderation in all things; the manufacturer should be satisfied with a moderate profit and he should so control the exchanges as to prevent their exacting the extreme price from the exhibitor. The harvest is rich but it should be so divided as to return a just, fair and equal reward to all engaged in garnering it.

* * * *

Tremendous developments are promised before Thanksgiving turkey is eaten. We are told that film manufacturers are to lose hundreds of customers and millions in revenue before the snow flies. Startling, if true, isn't it? Manufacturers should employ William J. Burns immediately and protect their future.

* * * *

Never in the history of the film industry have the manufacturers' exchange men and exhibitors realized more fully than at the present time the importance of giving the public the best films that their studios can produce, while a few years ago anything projected on the screen would satisfy; the industry at that time being to a certain extent regarded in a much lesser light than it is to-day.

DOROTHY KELLY

Dorothy Kelly, whose picture appears on the front cover, is a charming little ingenue, who is always an attraction in or out of pictures. She has had no past stage experiences which would emblazon her name on the programs of the city playhouses where headliners are the indication of fame. She is a product of home surroundings which have fitted her for the pictures in which she shines, as a natural actress, giving them an extra touch of life and lustre.

Miss Kelly is of Quaker extraction and was born in the city of "Brotherly Love," in the Keystone State, the birthplace of so many who have attained prominence in the history of our country. Everybody in The Vitagraph Company calls her "Dot." During the period of one year that she has been with the Vitagraph Company she has made herself a Vitagraph player from whom great pictorial achievements may be expected.

ARTHUR H. SAWYER

Our frontispiece portrait this week is that of Arthur H. Sawyer, manager of the Kinemacolor Company of America.

It will be noticed that while Mr. Sawyer talks most interview with him (which appears on pages 8 and 9 of this interview with him which appears on pages 8 and 9 of this issue), he has not told us anything about himself. That's something he left to his publicity lieutenant, Willard Holcomb, formerly known to newspaper fame as a dramatic writer and something of a dramatist withal. According to the biographical data supplied by Mr. Holcomb, Mr. Sawyer received an excellent education and was then launched upon a business career. After fifteen years' experience in commercial lines he entered the dramatic profession as an actor in order to study all the different phases of dramatic art. After a brief histrionic apprenticeship he became leading man for Nance O'Neill and other woman stars. Incidentally, he wrote and produced various vaudeville plays, making a study of the picture game at the same time.

Realizing the commercial possibilities of film entertainments he secured several motion picture theatres, and built others in Western Massachusetts and New York State, and made big successes with them as a result of advanced ideas in advertising and methods of putting on shows with appropriate music and other accessories. He has been in the motion picture field for nine years, beginning when the "store" show was in popular evidence. He introduced the first "talking" picture with people behind the screen that was ever exhibited in Massachusetts.

When Kinemacolor was brought to this country Mr. Sawyer sold out his theatre interests to secure an interest in the natural color pictures. He is the original Kinemacolor man in this country as the original American company was formed in Allentown, Pa. This company is closed out, and a new company, capitalized at six millions, has been organized. This is the present Kinemacolor Company of America, and, as it was largely through his efforts that the company was organized, he obtained a substantial financial interest and was appointed secretary and manager.

Mr. Sawyer has made a special study of moving pictures during the past ten years, and is acknowledged to be an authority in every branch of film production.

The Vitagraph Company has some open-air studio, occupying a stockade enclosure, covering an area of 150 by 450 feet. The stage is 100 feet deep by 150 feet in width, which can be enclosed whenever necessary. This studio is set apart and the stage built, for the large productions which it is rapidly making preparations to enact in the near future. The new building to the already large plant, is nearly completed. It provides a new glass-covered studio, 400 by 100 feet. So rapidly has the business grown these additions were imperative, and it is now hoped that they will meet the immediate needs of the company.

We are informed by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company that Warren Kerrigan has signed with them and will be connected with their Pacific Coast organization.

STUDIO GOSSIP

Gertrude McCoy has returned to the Edison studio after a delightful vacation of two weeks spent in the picturesque Blue Ridge Mountains.

Helen Marten and Milly Bright, of the Eclair Company, are spending all their spare time in practising swimming stunts for a thriller that will be filmed shortly, in which the girls will have to put over business that would be worthy of the lissome Annette Kellerman and sinuous Odiva combined.

* * * *

The Ryno Film Company is being congratulated on securing Miss Julia Bruns, the beautiful model of James Montgomery Flagg, the artist. Her versatility is readily recognized on the screen.

* * * *

Little Clara Horton, the Eclair Kid, is mighty glad she has but one birthday to celebrate in a year. The "happy family" gave Clara a really-truly party last week at the studio, with nine bright pink candles on a bright pink cake. Nine plates were laid for nine happy kiddies, who played nine bully games that the "happy family" had arranged beforehand.

* * * *

Director Harry C. Matthews continues making the most delightful "kid" and fairy-tale pictures conceivable. A few of his recent successes are: "The Love of Princess Yoland," "Gretchen" and "The Little Shepherd," all two-reel features of rare merit. Miss Elsie Albert and Baby Early divide the honors and shine amidst a galaxy of excellent players.

Philip A. Holman, publicity manager of the Pilot Company, made a little trip up in Connecticut on Saturday last, August 8th. When he came back the next day he had an order for the New England State Rights on "The Streets of New York," a three-reel feature recently produced by the Pilot Company.

* * * *

On August 7th and 8th the Jefferson Theatre, Hoboken, N. J., exhibited "The Streets of New York," a Pilot three-reel State Rights feature. One of the leading parts in this picture was played by Louise Vale, who for sometime played as leading lady in stock at the Gaiety Theatre in Hoboken, where she was very popular with all the theatre-goers of that vicinity.

"The Lubin Twins" have become "The Reliance Triplets," and are now preparing a series of comedies for early Reliance releases. Reehm and Stull, of "Spooney Sam" fame with the addition of Bobby Burns, make an interesting trio and will first be seen in a comedy entitled "The Lead Nickel."

* * * *

In the coming Forrest Halsey two-part drama "Success" Irving Cummings is supported by both Vivian Prescott and Irene Hunt. Folks around the studio say that it is the best picture that Oscar C. Apfel has staged in his long career as a director.

* * * *

Some of Director J. Farrell MacDonald's latest productions are "Everyman," "The Midianitish Woman," and "Jepthah's Daughter," a trio of excellent three-reel features. "Everyman" will undoubtedly stand pre-eminent amongst the classiest picturized classics, while "The Midianitish Woman" is sure to create no mild sensation when released. To take certain scenes, an entire Southern Pacific train was hired by the Venus producing manager, Thomas W. Evans, to convey a multitude of players, baggage and camping paraphernalia, out on the desert. For two days the entire company camped out on the hot, barren waste and suffered terribly from the infernal heat. Some of the actors, on their return to the big Venus studios in Hollywood, Cal., stated and reiterated that the heat was fully 190 degrees in the shade, which, undoubtedly, was some heat.

Although still in the course of construction, the new Reliance studio plant already shows signs of strenuous activity. The large open air stage is completed and easily accommodates the three companies that are using it. All hands are enthusiastic about the location which abounds in the beautiful scenery only possible on the high banks of the Hudson River.

Under the direction of Mr. Frank Powell, the Ryno Company is producing a picture of unusual merit, entitled "Her Last Ride." A story of the circus.

In producing this they have secured the sanction of Messrs. Sauttel, Lowande, and Rollins, in using their two ring circus, and have employed the services of the entire company of one hundred and fifty cowboys and girls, and the freak show of twenty, besides the menagerie of two camels, three elephants, two black bears, one polar bear, four leopards, and seventy horses.

With this local color, the Ryno Company should produce the best circus picture yet released.

Francis Powers makes his advent as a Reliance Director with a drama entitled "The Hardest Way." Mr. Powers has made an enviable record both with Pathe Freres and the Universal and is, perhaps, even better known as a writer than as a director, added to which his long association with David Belasco has stood him in good stead as a master of stagecraft.

The Paris branch of the Vitagraph Company is following the example of the main branch in America, by erecting one of the largest plants in Europe. It will be up-to-date in every respect with every modern improvement and every department in full relationship to the other.

Mr. R. A. Reader, business manager of the Vitagraph's interests in Europe, says the building of the factory will cost at least half a million; possibly more, before it is completed. His report of European conditions generally, and the extreme popularity of the Vitagraph Life Portrayals, has prompted the erection of larger facilities to meet the increasing demands for their productions.

The terrific electrical storm which struck New York, July 28th, had a most dramatic effect at the Edison studio. When the storm burst three stages were being used and every arc light in the studio was burning to full capacity.

Suddenly there was a deafening crash and every light in the building went out, plunging the studio into darkness. Above the great glass roof the black sky was ripped and slashed by angry flashes of lightning, which seemed to pierce the very roof itself. It was a magnificent display and the less timid ones were sorry when the arc lights glowed again and spoiled the effect.

Dan Mason's character make-ups have caused no end of amusement to many moving picture fans. The clever Edison comedian when asked how he learned the art of pictureplay make-ups so quickly, said that he did it in the same way in which he had learned it for the stage—by studying at home. "When I am told that I am going to play a certain character on the following day, I work on the make-up that night until I have gotten the effect I want. Then I appear before my wife and daughter and if I can make them laugh, I figure that the audience will laugh too."

The Vitagraph player, George Cooper, who will be remembered in "The Mills of the Gods," "The Drop of Blood" and some of Lambert Chase series, produced at the Eastern Vitagraph studios, recently went to Santa Monica to join the Western Vitagraph Company. On his way he stopped at a hotel in Los Angeles for a day or two. While there, some professional gentleman alert for business opportunities, entered his room and pried open his trunk, helping himself to George's gold watch and still further pursued his investigation into the possessions of another guest, from whom he stole several stick pins, and a watch fob. The professional prowler took his departure without leaving his name and address, therefore, his whereabouts is still a mystery. George reached his destination on time and is now working hard in Western productions with the determination to secure another watch with a burglar-proof attachment.

A Dragon feature film possessing excellent photography, acting, and true portrayal—the three essentials points in a feature—are readily recognized in their three-reel feature, "The Blindness of Courage" or "Between Two Loves." In producing this feature, no expense has been spared, and the thrilling scene of the complete demolition of an Indian stockade, nearly cost the life of the director, Mr. Jack Noble.

The cast, one that is known to every movie fan from coast to coast, is: Glen White, Jane Fearnley, Charles Horan, Julia Bruns, Hal Clarendon, of the Cecil Spooner Stock Company; Rodney Hickok, the famous musical comedy star, and Paul Hagen.

In "The Thirst for Gold," Will E. Sheerer was Convict 220, who is pronounced dead by the military surgeon, otherwise kindly Fred Truesdell. But Fred is strong for realism in films. After he pronounces Convict 220 dead, he is carried into another room for dissection, but comes out of a coma and makes his escape with the greedy surgeon's connivance, on promise of sharing the stolen gold he had hidden. Well, things went all right during rehearsals, but Bill did not like the looks of Doc Fred Truesdell's shiny dissecting knives. When the crank began to turn, Fred sprang forward to carve him up so earnestly, that as the cold steel tickled Bill's ribs, he jumped up with a suddenness that threw the surprised Fred entirely out of the picture. After explanations, and a mutual understanding between the supposed corpse and carver, the picture went on. Bill only wanted to make sure that Fred was not nursing a slight grudge against him.

Gene Gauntier, accompanied by Jack J. Clark, Sidney Olcott and Allen Farnham, sailed Thursday on the steamship Adriatic for Europe. Their first stop will be at London; from there the party will journey to the Lakes of Killarney and later their tour may embrace Scotland and other countries abroad.

The Gene Gauntier Feature Players were incorporated last December and released their product under the old Warner's Feature Film Company. They spent the winter in Jacksonville, Fla.—the scene of many of their triumphs when their leading members were associated with the Kalem Company. Gene Gauntier, of course, continues as the star of the organization now gone abroad, with Jack J. Clark as her leading man and Sidney Olcott as managing director. Associated with them also is Allen Farnham, the clever scenic artist and stage manager who was responsible for all the Irish and Egyptian, Scotch and English stage settings which were always a feature of the Kalem's international productions, and that Biblical masterpiece "From the Manger to the Cross."

Miss Gauntier and her associates have been working together for the past four years. During that time they have made three trips to Ireland and have traveled half way around the globe to secure the natural atmosphere for the pictures they have produced with such success.

Elmer Grandon, actor and director, formerly associated with the Imp, has joined the Selig stock forces at Los Angeles, bringing with him Guy Oliver, Stella Rosetta, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Brown of the Kinemacolor, camera man McKenzie, likewise Betty Schade (formerly leading lady with the American), Madeline Post, Ethel Davis and Francis Newberg, leading man with the Kalem and Vitagraph.

In a personal letter, addressed to Miss Vivian Rich, leading lady of the Flying A Stock Company, is contained the advice that the enthusiastic girls of Frankfort, Ind., have organized a social club known as the "American Club." The writer of the letter, Miss Pauline E. Shaffer, adds "and never a play is featured by the American Film Mfg. Co. that we do not see."

The crystallized enthusiasm of these ardent American fans will undoubtedly yield incalculable good by the wholesome stimulation and natural development of the mental faculties.

LINDA GRIFFITH

Linda Griffith, whose portrait is presented on another page, is a Californian, and her most thrilling experience was going through the San Francisco earthquake and fire. Before this she had been doing theatrical work in her native city, but went East after the devastation of San Francisco. She was ingenue with Florence Roberts and also with Margaret Anglin, but in those days was known as Linda Arvidson.

Miss Griffith is of Swedish descent, and last year spent the summer in Sweden visiting the home of her ancestors. She was one of the first members of the famous Biograph stock, from which many of the pictureplay stars of today graduated. She made her debut in pictures five years ago, playing opposite Arthur Johnson, and going from leads to playing in special productions, such as "Enoch Arden," "The Unchanging Sue," etc. She was with the Biograph until persuaded by Mr. Miles to become a leading woman with Kinemacolor last September. She has the distinction of having taken part in the great film showing the flight of Miss Quimby, the famous bird woman, across the English Channel, and which was produced in England by Gaumont.

Miss Griffith is of a studious turn of mind, and is a writer of no small merit, having contributed articles to Leslie's and other periodicals. In appearance she may be described as petite, a genuine blonde with great, serious eyes. Her acting is of the quiet, restrained, forceful kind, and she has created many striking characters since joining the Kinemacolor, being equally good in emotional roles and comedy parts. Perhaps her favorite part is in "As the Candle Burns," wherein she played an entire life of a woman from childhood to youth, from motherhood to old age.

She is an enthusiast on Kinemacolor, as has been shown in various articles she has published lately. In "The Scarlet Letter"—generally considered the finest pictureplay produced by Kinemacolor—Miss Griffith appears as the heroine, Hester Prynne; while in the pictorial adaptation of the old English morality play, "Everyman," she plays the title role and appears in every scene. Her work before the camera is remarkable for the intensity of emotion she expresses with a minimum of movement or gesticulation.

ADOLPH ZUKOR TO SAIL

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Company, will sail for Europe August 20th on the Mauretania. Mr. Zukor will make a whirlwind tour of the continent in the interests of his company. It is believed that he sails on an important mission, details of which will be forthcoming after his arrival on the other side.

HIGH STANDARD OF PICTURES IS URGED

Mrs. Phillips Smalley Discusses Moving Pictures at Woman's Club, San Francisco, Cal.

Before a large and extremely enthusiastic audience a discussion on moving pictures from the standpoint of the maker and the public was held at the Woman's Club recently, the speakers being Mrs. Phillips Smalley, Mayor of Universal City, and director of many Universal pictures, and Mrs. P. G. Hubert, member of the local censorship board.

Mrs. Smalley spoke with the authority of personal knowledge, having for the last nine years been a scenario writer, an actress and an interested worker for the betterment of the general standard of pictureplays. Mrs. Hubert spoke of the work involved in the censorship of films and praised the support given by the exhibitors when exception is taken to a particular feature of the play.

Regarding the great interest taken by the community in pictures, Mrs. Hubert said: "There was a time when none here would have gone to see moving pictures, but now we often have to stand in line and we see our friends there, too."

Mrs. Smalley said in part:

"I have hoped for some years to see the indifferent and often condemning attitude held up by refined and cultured people toward motion pictures give place to the same unblazed inquiry which they extend to other public matters of equal and sometimes less importance.

"It comes as a pleasant and grateful surprise that the representative women of Los Angeles are the first to give us encouragement.

"During two years of church army work I had ample opportunity to regret the limited field any individual worker would embrace even by a life of endeavor. And meeting with many in that field who spoke strange tongues, I came to realize the blessing a voiceless language would be.

"Naturally, the first things to appeal to me where motion pictures were concerned were the vast area one picture would cover and the millions of people who would understand its language.

"Unfortunately the first motion pictures were necessarily only experiments crude and common, or uninteresting.

"With the memory of the motion pictures' old reputation still green, the dignity of the intelligent public demand a feature picture such as the Kinemacolor Durbar, or one of travel or educational value shown in a high-priced theatre, if their presence is desired.

"The result is that those pictures are made especially for that audience which is in no need of education, and as they are too long and expensive to be shown in cheap houses of varied programs, the five-cent audiences get no benefit from them and is no better off than if the high-class audience never had lent its support.

"The person who applauds loudest at an entertainment is not necessarily the best judge of its merits, but applause is the only criterion the management has of the success of his offering.

"The program that is most loudly applauded either by atendance or public notice is the one the manufacturer is going to conclude is most popular.

"Unfortunately, few people of superior minds lean toward noise, and the manufacturer's opinion is left to the mercy of those who do.

"The big feature producers have already the co-operation of people worth while, but I am presenting the cause of the one-reel picture seen in five and ten-cent houses. There is no reason why those programs cannot be both artistic and educational, if any audience can be interested that will appreciate and demand it.

"And as the pictures must find a sale all over the world to make them pay, the directors and authors are sorely taxed to meet all requirements and yet turn out an entertaining picture, or even point a moral convincingly.

"The name of each manufacturer is on the film, and the manufacturer is grateful for serious communications and regards them seriously. The manager of the theatre would benefit by the same interest and usually can be reached with ease.

"So much has been said about the glamour and danger of the motion picture work that I must touch briefly on that subject.

"In the first place, I know of no more healthy life than the motion picture people live out of doors. I also know of none that induces greater physical weariness. And as health is one of the first steps towards right living, so is legitimate exhaustion one of the greatest foes to vice.

"Undesirable characters are to be found everywhere, but few of such characters could stand reporting for work every morning at 8 o'clock, working all day in the blazing sun, or the cold, or whatever weather exists, without comforts, and enduring minor hardships in out-of-the-way places, such as poor food or none, many changes of costumes, bumping over rough roads, and paying at all times strict attention to business.

"That routine soon weeds out the undesirables, is evidenced by the delightful people who have succeeded in this business, most of whom welcomed it as a longed-for opportunity to be with their families in a permanent home."

FRANCIS POWERS TO DIRECT FOR RELIANCE

The force of Reliance stage directors has been strengthened by the addition of Francis Powers, formerlly of Pathe Freres and late director for the Universal Company.

Mr. Powers is a man of broad experience in stage craft, being well known as an actor and as an author before he entered the moving picture field. For several years he was associated with David Belasco, making a number of valuable contributions to the dramatic stage as a playwright. He quickly gained recognition as a moving picture director of ability, in which capacity he will begin work for the Reliance on Monday, August 11th, his first picture production being a serious drama entitled "The Hardest Way," which will be released early in September.

A farewell dinner is in progress at Benny Haven's, West Point, when Captain Williams enters and addresses himself to Lieutenant Jack Bronson. That the best of feeling does not exist between the captain and the lieutenant is evident from the manner in which the captain is received and dismissed. As the dinner is a private affair, given as a farewell by Lieutenant Bronson to his classmates, the captain has no alternative but to depart.

The troop of cavalry, of which both are members, has been ordered West, and there the angry passions of Williams have every opportunity to spend themselves to the detriment of Jack Bronson.

At the home of Colonel Graham, his beautiful young wife succumbs to the charms of the handsome Lieutenant

SCENE FROM "FOR THE FLAG"

Bronson, a condition that is entirely unsolicited and unwelcome to the lieutenant. The captain exposes the affair to the colonel, but not in a manner calculated to do credit to the lieutenant. The Colonel investigates and finds the lieutenant in a compromising attitude, for which the Colonel's wife was wholly responsible. Surprised by her husband, she denounces Bronson, whose sense of chivalry precludes the possibility of his contradicting the woman. The affair leads to a court-martial of Jack Bronson on a charge of assaulting his superior officers, for which he is dishonorably discharged from the service.

Bronson then leaves America and goes to the Philippines, where he enlists as a private. Later Captain Williams and his company are assigned to the Philippines for service. The Captain recognizes Jack, but the latter denies his identity.

At a ball given at the Governor's palace Jack is on duty as the Captain's orderly, when a Spanish girl is assaulted by Williams, for which Jack knocks him down (an unpardonable offence in time of war). Realizing the hopelessness of an attempt to defend his conduct, Jack fights his way through the guard and escapes, together with a fellow soldier. They purchase a boat and put out to sea, and after a few days of buffeting by an angry sea, they are washed ashore in an exhausted condition. Here they are found by a friendly officer who carries word to the fair Juanita. Bronson's heroism is again in evidence previous to an attack by bolo men. His identity being discovered he pleads with the Governor, "Let me fight for the flag now, then do with me what you will."

During the battle, marked by many fierce hand-to-hand conflicts, Jack rescues the captain and leads his forces to victory.

The gradual evolution of this absorbing tale furnishes a series of most delightful thrills. Producer Johnson has done himself excellent credit by his masterful manipulation of delicate situations. The marked histrionic ability of J. Warren Kerrigan and the efficiency of the supporting cast, make this production a veritable gem of its class and will prove a treat to exhibitors and public alike.

A WATERLOO OUT WEST

"Jack Meets His Waterloo" is the title of a novel farce drama written by J. Warren Kerrigan, in which the author plays the leading role as a Western favorite in a ranch town. A bevy of country maidens vie with one another for favors with the handsome young deputy sheriff, which appointment he received shortly after his arrival as a guest of his father's friend, the local sheriff. Sallie Newman, a ranchman's daughter, returns from school and holds herself aloof from any attentions. Bill Acres, her old sweetheart, receives but scant courtesies and he taunts the handsome deputy sheriff about the one girl in town he dare not kiss.

Jack proceeds to disprove this in a manner that arouses the animosity of Bill, and lays the foundation for a feud that bids fair to result fatally to a number of participants. By the shrewdness of Jack, the plot is thwarted and the perpetrator landed in the toils. Some excellent comedy touches are added in the evolution of the story and the whole presents a very pleasing offering.

The American Film Co. also announce the release of "Red Sweeney's Defeat," Saturday, September 13, 1913, a one-reel Western feature. Other subjects on the same order will follow, as there has been a big demand for this class of subjects.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

It Is Coming

THE open market is en route and will soon be here. Are you prepared? The open market will mean the end of the contract writer; it will mean the survival of the fittest; it will mean that the story will be regarded as the important part of the picture and that the price will be accordingly; it will mean competition and the winning out of the best pictures. No more hackeneyed plots; no more monotonous Westerns; no more deadly dull triangles when the open market arrives. This is a prediction, but we prophesy with assurance. When the open market comes, and the manufacturers must compete on their merits, more attention will be paid to the plot of the story. Originality is at a premium right now, but it will be even more so with the open market. Get you busy and prepare to be ready for the milennium.

No $1,000 Scripts

The industrial film company which recently advertised, offering "$1,000 for the best scripts," has recently reorganized, and the man whose script fancy lightly turned to $1,000 is no longer connected with that particular concern. But what of the clever writers who were taken in by that $1,000 offer? They spent time and trouble writing stuff available to but one certain market. The best was culled out and small checks sent. The rest of the stuff was rejected. All that time these writers might have been devoting their thoughts to the regular markets. Again we repeat: Do not enter prize contests; do not think that $1,000 is ever to be paid for an industrial or any other kind of a script in this day and age; play safe!

Bulletin

The winning scripts in the Powers prize contest were dusted off, looked over, and then returned to the shelves. Nothing doing yet anent the production of these stories which was a condition of the contest. And the crucifix that caused expert argumentation when it accompanied the first prize script has been lost. It was a family heirloom, and the owner has been beating the tom-tom of distress for several moons. Verily, it is distressing!

Keep At It

You write a script most carefully. You submit it to a favored company. The script is returned. You are discouraged. You shove said script in the morgue. Why? Maybe some other editor would like that script. Editors differ in their ideas, you know. Give it a thorough circulation. If you have not faith in your stuff, why write it?

Just a Reminiscence

The above admonition reminds us of the time we wrote a Thanksgiving script. It was not received with thanksgiving by the editor who had ordered it. Neither were we thankful when it was returned. A year later we submitted that identical script, not a word changed, to that self-same company. A different editor was on the job. He read the script, liked it, and bought it. It was intended for Thanksgiving; instead it was released as a Christmas picture. You never can tell!

A Change of Pace

A change of pace is an essential qualification for a good baseball pitcher. It is sometimes an enviable qualification for a good script writer. A well-known and successful scribe has changed his pace. He writes us the following: "I'm going in for two-reel stuff along with the rest. I've specialized in comedy for so long that I find it a little hard to originate a dramatic plot. Took me two days to get one I wanted. Guess I can swing it in the long run, but the first one came hard. That is where the market is these days." Here is a writer who found his market bad, and his output cut down. What did he do? He changed his pace and switched to two-reel stuff. Of course, he has a market for his new output. Otherwise he wouldn't switch. The point is that he made a quick and rather difficult change after years of specialization in comedy. Maybe you need a change of pace. Maybe you have been specializing in comedy, when you should be specializing in drama, or vice-versa.

Editorial Etchings

Mrs. Breuil has resigned as script editress of Vitagraph. This news will be regretted by thousands of script writers.

W. Hanson Durham, editor Western Vitagraph, is able to be at the studio after three months' confinement. He fell down stairs and broke his knee. Just the same he managed to keep several directors busy.

The Majestic Company has acquired Richard Willis, formerly a Western editor for Universal.

Eugene Valentine Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, also writes "The Photoplay Philosopher" department in that bright monthly magazine. So many are demanding to know who is writing that good copy that we just have to tell.

Philip Lonergan has been appointed editor-in-chief of the Majestic Company. The work of writing and purchasing scripts will now be accomplished under one head, and a level head at that.

Checked Rejection Slips

And still the objections anent editorial checking of rejection slips are being received. If the editor checks the slip, it will do in the majority of cases. If some stenographer checks, "similar to magazine story" by mistake, it is doing the author an injustice. We advocate the return to the old-time "regrets" system. The system of checking reasons for rejection is unsatisfactory at the best and often arouses antagonism on the part of writers—something wise editors wish to forestall.

Word From Henderson

Mr. Will T. Henderson, of Chicago, a script writer who quotes Latin on the slightest provocation, is responsible for this one: "A great deal has been said pro and con as to sub-titles in scripts of motion picture stories. Some have contended in various publications that I have read that sub-titles should never be used except where absolutely necessary in order to make the action understood. During the past three months, I have made diligent inquiry among patrons of motion picture exhibitions, and without knowing my personal opinion on the subject, all with whom I have spoken about it, have expressed themselves, without exception, emphatically in favor of the use of sub-titles, whether they are necessary to make the meaning clear or not, providing they are used judicially to the end that they will serve to enhance added interest in the scene that is to follow. This is the way I have always felt about it, and I believe that the majority of moving picture patrons are of that opinion. How much more interesting and entertaining a picture in a book or periodical is when accompanied by a caption of some sort, even though the intent of the artist is perfectly clear without it. I want to go on record as being in favor of sub-titles judicially exploited, whether they are necessary for a clear understanding of the scene or not." Mr. Henderson's argument is very nicely put, but the contention that sub-titles should never be used except where absolutely necessary to make the action clear, is the correct contention. People do not go to the picture theatre to read sub-titles, they go to be entertained and interested in a plot and story as it is unfolded on the screen. They can read all the head-letter wished for in a penny newspaper, and their nickels, dimes and quarters are paid into the box office of the theatre for something else. Sub-titles at the best rob a picture of atmosphere and interest. We hope the time will come when sub-titles will not be at all necessary.

Pertinent Pointers

Don't pose. If you have sold a half dozen stories don't let your hair grow long. The most successful writers look just like ordinary persons.

"I had one two-reel, one three-reel and two single reels purchased in July and the weather was rather warm," writes a correspondent. We print this for the benefit of those who are blaming their lack of industry on the climate.

Write love making sparingly and with delicacy. Have the hero win the girl and let the plot hinge upon this.

Too much courtship on the screen becomes monotonous and too much kissing becomes disgusting.

Why do you imagine that a romantic plot must necessarily end with marriage? You are in the rut. In your next romance start your plot right after marriage and see if you do not develop something strikingly different and yet absorbing.

When writing comedy it should begin with a humorous situation full of diverting action. A quick jump right from the start is one-third of the comedy battle. All pictureplays should be probable, but comedy sometimes permits reasonable latitude.

It is true that the market demands a happy ending. However, if your plot is weakened by being twisted into the usual lovers' embrace, don't twist it, that's all. Certain of the editors will buy strong plots even without the usual happy ending.

When writing a plot for a male lead do not forget the girl. However popular the masculine star, interest is bound to center sooner or later in the feminine figure and the stronger appeal will be made if the girl is made happy in the picture.

The streets teem with suggestions, the newspapers contain hints, and frequently a magazine story will suggest an entirely new idea to the pictureplay writer. We have known a neighborhood party to suggest a plot that proved a successful comedy. It is not hard to train the mind to observe seemingly unimportant facts that give rise to extraordinary plots. Carry a notebook with you.

If you have to choose between a letter and a sub-title, choose the letter. Letters opened and read by an actor or actress in the picture carry along the thread of the story more convincingly than a sub-title break. The sub-title is entirely foreign to the picture itself.

Reading Back Numbers

A well known script writer sends in the following: "Beginning with the issue of February 1st, last, I have reread your departments in every issue of the News up to and including the last issue, July 21st. Twenty-five issues in all and you would be surprised how entertaining and interesting and newly-instructive they all were, though I read each one thoroughly, at the time I received each copy. One does not fully and properly digest what one reads upon first reading, especially if one happense to be busy working on some 'masterpiece.' A perusal of your writings would prove beneficial to any writer. I found much food for thought in your writings which I may have, and no doubt did note at the time I first read them but which, sad to relate, became lost in the vicissitudes of every-day activity." Every writer of moving picture plays should take every publication devoted to any branch of the art and he or she should save these publications. Rereading back numbers is not time wasted but, on the contrary, is time very well employed by those who wish to live and learn. The suggestion is a good one.

A Change of Heart

Last week we published a letter from a scribe who was discouraged. Since our observations, he has shed the Christian's burden, waded out of the Slough of Despond, and steps blithely up to the home plate with this one: "Who is guilty? I am, and so is every aspirant to pictureplay writing fame who possesses a fair education and a modicum of imaginative possibility and, having 'bearded the lion in his den' develops a 'yellow streak' and gives up merely because the scenario editors do not get ultra-enthusiastic over the results of his or her efforts. I did think I was about through trying but now I am convinced that the thought was a sort of mental aberration, so to speak. We all 'have our moments of depression' as you are sometimes wont to remark, and imagine we are checkmated. But I am going to 'come back' and I'll win the battle of script writing or know the reason why, not merely guess at it." This is the proper spirit, good friend, and it rings truer than the cry of distress you emitted not long since. Stick to the ship!

The Latest Prize Contest

The San Francisco Bulletin conducted the latest prize contest. Lillian Clift, A. L. Browne, and H. A. Buerkle, won the prizes in the order named. G. M. Anderson presented them and he also divided $200 among the lucky ones. The winner of the first prize is a mother and a dress maker. Her script was the best in 2,000 submitted. "The Golden Lily" was the title of her script. This contest is worthy of especial mention because G. M. Anderson was the judge and, needless to state, he was a competent one. How Mrs. Clift came to write a pictureplay for which she received $200 in cash will be interesting to other beginners. She says:

"I read the suggestions in The Bulletin every night, even the questions and answers, and I learned by what you said to the others. I had no idea how to go about writing a scenario until I saw the lessons in The Bulletin. I had 'The Girl and the Rustler' in my head for a long time, but I did not know how to write it. When you began to print your lessons I faithfully followed every suggestion. I practiced first on 'The Girl and the Rustler,' but after I had it written I thought, 'My, that will never do; they have too many cowboy stories already.' Then the thought came to me of Miss Donaldina Cameron and her sensational rescues. I deliberately chose a Chinese story for its picturesque settings. I knew it would have to have a love story in it or it would not suit the popular taste. I knew that it had to end happily, or it would not be popular. And I knew from the suggestions that it had to have lots of action, and that the whole story would have to tell itself in pictures. Then I chose pictures that I thought could be made in California, and at the same time get away from the old cowboy atmosphere. After I had chosen my subject, I went down to the library and got 'The Changing Chinese,' by Professor Ross, so I would make no error as to the Chinese customs, and then I read another book, 'My Corner in Cathay,' by a woman, I don't remember who. I got a lot of customs from that. After I got my material together I began to go to picture shows. I had never gone much before that. But I got so I would go whenever I would have a little spare time, and I would remember what I had read in The Bulletin, and I would look at the pictures from a technical standpoint and analyze their scenes. I had everything worked out before I started to write, so the actual writing did not take long. But toward the last I worked over it every spare minute. Of course, the only time a mother really has to herself is in the evenings, and toward the last I made good use of mine. I didn't think one way or the other about winning a prize. When I saw the announcement I made up my mind I'd try, and I did the very best I could."

Here is a mother with several children who by toil and study wins first prize in a contest over 2,000 competitors. You will notice that she visited the library in order to be sure of what she was writing of, and that she got away from the cowboy atmosphere, as she expresses it. What this woman can do, others can do.

The Synopsis

One of the associate editors in the above contest, writing of her experiences, unconsciously puts in a strong argument for the short synopsis, something we have been advocating for nearly two years. She writes: "The film companies are hungering and thirsting for good scenarios. There is a famine," says Mr. Anderson, "in spite of the incredible number of motion pictures that are put out every month. All that most of the scenarios need is more plot development, a little more care to the structure of the scene, and fewer words in the synopsis. The lengthy synopses did not stagger us. We managed to plow through them. But the film manufacturers will not make allowances for the lady who wrote us a nice apologetic letter about her synopsis taking aver 1 500 words, although she did manage to cut it down from 3,000. What professional scenario readers want is a short synopsis of 250 words or fewer. And it will be a pleasant summer occupation for some of our contributors to cut theirs down to fit the requirements. Fortunately, Mr. Anderson is proverbially good natured, and his directors seem to be gifted with angelic dispositions. They took a personal interest in every manuscript submitted, and made a list of at least 100 names of writers who will hear from them later."

Strictly for Amateurs

All the plays purchased in The Bulletin contest will be produced by Essanay. One of the judges in giving an account of the awarding of the first prize says: "We all agreed that Mrs. Clift's manuscript was the best. Mr. Anderson sent his car to bring her to the office and to our astonishment she sent back word that she was busy with her babies and could not be down for an hour. We were going to put her through a course of questioning to ascertain if she was really an amateur. When she appeared she was grilled in a way that would have done justice to the most exacting district attorney and then dismissed without a definite notion as to whether she was to receive a prize or not. When she came to the office next day she said she went home and cried because she felt we had all been so hostile to her. But the truth of the matter was that her manuscript was so perfect that it was in a class by itself, and we wanted to live up to our word that no professional writer would receive consideration." As we have previously stated, we are not in favor of the average prize contest. However, with G. M. Anderson as a judge, and Essanay promising to produce the winning stories which were submitted by amateurs only, this contest, we think, was worthy. Particularly will it tend to encourage others who are new to the gentle art of script writing."

ACTION IS THE KEYNOTE OF THIS ITALA-DANMARK FILM

It is amazing the amount of action in the Itala-Danmark four-reel feature, "The War Correspondents." Here we have a collection of big scenes intimately related and having direct bearing on the story that unite in making a feature that cannot help but please. It would be difficult to find a film containing a larger variety of casualties.

Here are some of them:

A war vessel is sunk by a hidden mine. A railroad train plunges into the river below through an aperture in a bridge blown up by the enemy. A theatre is demolished by a shell fired from a mile's distance. The hero foils his rival in his attempt to get the story of the battle over the wires to the rival newspaper by burning the telegraph pole and putting the wires out of order. The hero falls over a precipice and is daringly rescued by the heroine. An aeroplane is shattered by a well directed shot from a high-power field gun. A dance in the Sultan's harem is disturbed by the attacking armies. The heroine jumps off a fast moving train and rolls down a steep embankment.

"The War Correspondents" won't need much praise by its manufacturers and in saying the most for it they won't be using hyperbole. Those who see it will do all the shouting necessary.

GOOD-BYE TO THE PIKER

By Harry R. Raver, Director-General of the Itala Film Co.

The piker has had his day. In his little way he has aided the film business. Now his usefulness is coming to an end.

The film business is settling itself. Into the film industry are coming solid, representative business men, capable and with big ideas. As the entry of big interests has squelched the piker in other industries, so shall he be squelched in the film industry.

The tendency of the feature film business is the long time contract. The tenet of business logic is that there is no money in selling any man once. Only in the continuity of sales to the particular person is there profit.

The dabbler is doomed. A glance at the sure progress of the Exclusive Supply Corporation's feature program is convincing. In various parts of the United States there are now large feature film exchanges who have contracted for the entire output of features and sometimes single-reel releases, of the major companies. It is obvious that when one company operating in a state or group of states controls the output of Itala, Gaumont, Great Northern, Solax, Eclectic and others, that there are meagre pickings left. Such a connection gives advertising value of great strength to that feature film company; it gives the stamp of the old established firm. It is bulwarked by trademarks and by brands. Itala, Solax, Great Northern or whatever it may be, are names which mean quality to millions of eyes. To have one feature company control their output is indicative of a strength that will put money into the bank and to make possible big dividends.

There are buyers who have sauntered along in a fool's paradise thinking that they can always continue to now and then buy a feature film and let it go at that. There is progression in every legitimate business. The film business is no exception. It will, of course, always be possible for the piker to get something that is called a feature. There will always be companies who are ready to turn out what is so misnamed. However, the exhibitor is being educated rapidly. He is less and less inclined to deal with the unknown. He has done so to his sorrow. He begins now to feel a general distrust for the unfamiliar. He understands that the company which makes one feature film, so-called, and then quietly as possible goes out of business and leaves no address behind, is dangerous. He cannot afford to show to exhibitors those pictures which are falsely overrated in meretricious advertisements. He now knows that when Gaumont, Itala, Solax or Great Northern make a picture that these companies have an artistic conscience and that they realize that their product must live up to their reputations suffer. Their stories must be stories, their pictures must be pictures. Excuses never paid the bond interest and never shall.

No vague prophecy is this statement. It doesn't refer to a possibility. It points directly to a certainty. Science proves that we either go forward or backward. We cannot stand still. If we do stand still we soon cease to stand at all—we fall. This is applicable to the feature film business. If there is to be no progression, there is to be nothing. I and many others have faith in the future of the feature. Its demand has not been artificially created.

Out of the ranks of other businesses men of brains and capital are coming into the feature business. They are looking over the map of the United States for good territories. They are going to settle. They are going to tie up to the real manufacturers and let the piker do the worrying. It is inevitable. It is for the progressive feature film man, therefore, to get busy and see beyond today into the many to-morrows. If he doesn't the colossal figures of men of affairs in other businesses are going to so obscure the map that he will be unable to see where he "gets off," or rather, where he stays in.

Philadelphia, Pa.—A contract has been let for the erection of moving picture theatre by Enos R. Headman for Frank Hess, at cost of $11,000.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT'S PAGE

THE magazine editor and the magazine contributor are experiencing change of heart. No longer does the editor look upon the moving pictures with contemptuous disdain, and no longer is the writer of fiction taught to pass the moving picture play by on the other side. The writer of fiction is studying the moving picture form of plot. The editor of fiction is also studying this form of literary work for the simple reason that many of the good plots he used to look over are now read first by the gentlemanly editor of pictureplays. For a long time the literary authorities and stars looked upon moving pictures and their preparation as a fad—just like the roller skating rinks, and the ancient high wheel bicycles. "Just a fad which will pass away along with the rest," was the concensus of opinion. And now that opinion has been changed!

* * * *

The entrance of the better class actors and actresses into picturedom was the final straw that broke the camel's back of skepticism. If Cinematography appeals to Hackett, Mrs. Fiske, Belasco and the rest, it certainly should appeal to us, was the thought of the editors of monthly magazines. Immediately there blossomed forth in numerous periodicals, the history of Cinematography, photographs of well-known moving picture actors and actresses, etc. The magazines have followed the cynical newspapers into the moving picture fold.

* * * *

And writers for the magazines quickly caught the cue. There had been a general rush for textbooks and trade journals having to do with Cinematography, and the star writers are turning their attention to the new sort of plot invention. Will they succeed in a new branch of the profession previously scorned? Probably they will. But they have discovered that they cannot condescendingly wander into the realm of picture play plot evolution, but that they must study and work along with the others. Many fascinated by the new work, are studying and striving to please. This action, with natural talent, augurs success for many. In fact, during the past six months, at least a dozen well-known writers of short stories have written successful one and two-reel moving picture stories.

* * * *

And why should the fiction writer and the fiction editor ever have scorned the art of pictureplay writing? In our opinion the art is greater than that of short story writing. We are in a position to speak, we think, for we have sold both short stories and pictureplay plots. The pictureplaywright transmits his emotions and his lessons to many millions of people. It is a new universal language for it tells a story in a simple way so that all who run may read. For five cents the toiler may see and enjoy wonders never before permitted him: he sees alien people and understands what they mean to him; he finds himself. The writer of pictureplay plots has a power that is just beginning to be appreciated by the man outside. The magazine story is read and cast aside; the pictureplay story is impressed upon the spectator and its lesson for good lingers long in the most unsuspected places. The pictureplaywright is a power in the land; a greater power than editor or producer, for, after all, his idea is what makes the story and the lesson for good or for evil.

* * * *

And while writing of the power conveyed to the unassuming by the moving picture medium, we often wonder if the actors and actresses who pose for the screen appreciate the power that they wield? And then, on the other hand, do those who visit the theatres to enjoy the work of their favorites in Cinematography appreciate what it means to work before the camera's eye. There are constantly new personalities to study out and depict. Maybe one day the moving picture actress is a dancer, the next a cowgirl and the next day she is called upon to be an artist's model. These roles must be given naturally and it means incessant hard work and strain. It is the same with the moving picture actor. A day spent in a studio would teach those ambitious to take up this line of work that it is work in every sense of the word and unusual accomplishments are essential for success. But the rewards are pleasing at that. These actors doing their work from day to day in the enclosed studios in one sense become acquainted with millions of people. These people know the studio folk well; they know their little eccentricities, their faults and their best traits. In South America they may be discussing the mannerisms of such-and-so, while in Alaska the charms of Miss So-and-so may popularize a theatre. Then the letters received by many of these artists from unknown people! Letters that tell of good done in many walks of life through acting in pictureplays; letters thanking one for an hour's pleasure; letters from the unknown thanking these actors and actresses for giving much to the world, and casting bread upon the waters, to have it returned a hundred fold in the shape of sincere letters of appreciation for the sunshine and the happiness diffused. It is a great reward to receive these letters—a great reward!

Like other good things in this life the War Cry has been ridiculed. Nearly every barn-storming theatrical company in the land, and every passe vaudeville performer has sprung that old joke about being "sporting editor of the War Cry." All right; it aided in advertising the official gazette of the Salvation Army in the United States, and we are also going to advertise the publication. Recently we bought a copy of the War Cry. There on page one and taking up two-thirds of the page was a tinted picture of a scene from Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross." It was printed by permission of the Kalem Company. The War Cry gives a big endorsement to Cinematography by this exploitation of a great Biblical subject. It proves to our mind that the War Cry is continuing the broad-minded work for the uplift of humanity for which it has been noted in the past.

When are the fangs of the Penny Dreadful in Filmland to be extracted? When is the literature of the hayloft to be permitted to remain there and not be constantly dragged down and screened to swell the coffers of the misguided and to furnish excellent material to keep the reformers busy combatting moving pictures? We have been informed in a lordly way that we are a little too radical on the subject of the Penny Dreadful Picture. Well, we have no axe to grind excepting the one calculated to make the moving picture industry better, and brighter, and more dignified. The filming of dime novels will not help along the culmination. The days of the yellow-back are behind it. It is no longer of use. Unforbidden, without advertisement as an instructor in the ways of wrongdoing, it is not worth any youngster's while now to sneak away under the eves of the attic and pretend to get pleasure out of those palpitating incidents and hiccoughy exchanges of sensational conversation. Now, the written adventures of Dashing Dan, the Boy Detective, Old Sleuth and Nick Carter are not universally read because they are universally filmed. They may do no harm, as is alleged by certain feature concerns and other manufacturers. However, there is a difference of opinion. And every time some small boy runs away from home with pap's old rifle, he tells the police that he was incited to kill Indians, or become a detective, because of scenes at moving picture shows. At least the newspapers so report it. Then the fanatics yell and the moving pictures get another black eye. Why not taboo the literature of the hayloft and in so doing remove a grand old standby being worked overtime by enemies of the picture screen? Surely, other plots not so puerile can be easily obtained.

ROBESPIERRE

THREE-REEL FRENCH REVOLUTIONARY IMP DRAMA

Released September 10th by the Universal Film Company

ROBESPIERRE is a production of Herbert Brenon from a dramatization by George Hollis. It was thrown on the screen recently at the Universal Film's Headquarters, 1600 Broadway, for the benefit of a select audience of newspaper representatives and other interested spectators.

ROBESPIERRE BEING DRAGGED TO THE GUILLOTINE

The most remarkable feature of this production is the handling of the mob scenes. As the turbulence of the revolutionary mobs could not be emphasized by yells of fury, their fiendishness and cruelty had to be conveyed by abundant—possibly superabundant—action. The leading characters were all enacted by competent actors and actresses. The scenic effects were also of a high order.

It is to be hoped that Robespierre will be followed by other pictureplays of equal historical interest. The story deals with an exciting episode of the French Revolution, in which love, intrigue, treachery, bravery, self-sacrifice, bloodshed, and ultimate triumph of hero and heroine are important elements. The main incidents of the plot are as follows:

Robespierre and Dumont were sworn friends in their college days. During their early manhood both loved Louise de Brissac, but she favored Dumont and refused the hand of Robespierre. Her father was the local magistrate and was blamed by the peasantry for the impost of a severe tax. Robespierre was too wise to blame him, but had already grown to despise authority. The Marquis de Brissac was the representative of the rulers in the province, so Robespierre visited him with a delegation of angered farmers. They were coldly received, and their anger grew until the Marquis was saved from mob violence only by the arrival of Dumont, who persuaded the malcontents to withdraw.

Time passed and the wedding of Louise and Dumont was postponed. Robespierre and Dumont, hearing of the mob disorders in Paris, leave with the Brissacs. Robespierre, although young and without influence, soon dominates the Assembly. Dumont, while deploring the massacres, is still the friend of Robespierre. The love of Robespierre for Louise grows in fervor as does his hatred for her father, and finally he sends Dumont to arrest the Marquis and Louise as aristocrats. The father is arrested, and Dumont, after aiding the girl to escape, is taken prisoner and sentenced to die.

Louise sees from a window the violence of the mob taking her father to the guillotine. The girl, knowing also the threatened fate of Dumont, in despair, decides to visit the tyrant and beg for her lover's life. This is granted to her on the condition that she throw over Dumont and give herself to Robespierre. Her soul revolts from this degradation and disloyalty to Dumont, but her spirit quails when Robespierre shows her the carmagnole or devil dance of the revolutionists. She consents to the self-sacrifice on condition that Dumont be set free, and that she be privileged to hand him his pardon. Louise, accompanied by Robespierre's spy, goes to the prison, where Dumont repudiates the bargain, and hurls the spy to the door of the dungeon.

In the meantime Tallien has impeached the Committee of Public Safety, of which Robespierre is the head, and a spirited debate ensues in the convention. This results in Robespierre's overthrow. He is shot down by the bullet of an assassin, and Tallien triumphs, while Robespierre is dragged away, a wounded prisoner. Tallien hurries to the prison and Dumont is released. Dumont, seeing Robespierre's spy dragging Louise along, hurls him to the ground and brings her to a place of safety. Subsequently the happy couple view the execution of Robespierre.

THE ARREST

"IN THE COILS OF THE PYTHON"

One who is looking for a film which abounds in thrills and who is fond of those chilly sensations slowly creeping up one's spinal column, cannot possibly be disappointed after witnessing the release of the 101 Bison, "In the Coils of the Python." This film was shown at the Universal to a few members of the press and officers of the company. The natural jungle settings, clear photography, splendidly directed and clever situations, stamp it as a very remarkable picture of its kind. The actions of the wild beasts of the jungle, particularly the pythons, were much commented upon and brought forth the remark: "How did they get the pythons to act their part," which was not nearly as remarkable as to how did they get the people to have the nerve to face these denizens of the forest. To see a giant python thirty-five feet long slowly creeping up to the Sukah and wind himself completely around his body is enough to satisfy anyone.

The synopsis tells us that.

The story deals with life in the wild regions of India, and introduces the savage treachery of the beasts of the jungle, together with the brave deeds of men. The hero of the story is entrapped in the jungle by a villainous Indian—a Sukah—and is bound and left to the mercy of the wild denizens of the jungle. A tiger scents his prey and is about to find him, when his attention is drawn to the smell of meat close at hand, and springs into a baited net which has been placed there by a hunter. The hero is rescued in the nick of time after a series of exciting and natural incidents. The treacherous Sukah is attacked and killed by a giant python, which is nearly thirty-five feet long and which weighs over 375 pounds.

SCENE FROM "IN THE COILS OF THE PYTHON"

In another part of the picture several persons are chased by a tiger and the heroine is nearly caught by a monster boa constrictor—one of the largest in the country—measuring twenty-nine feet and weighing nearly 300 pounds. It is a hair-raising picture, and requires some considerable nerve upon the part of the principal actors and actresses. William Clifford heads the actors in the cast and Phyllis Gordon, the women, and other parts are in the hands of Sherman Bainbridge, Frank Howe, Clarence Burton, Margaret Oswald and Jane Barrell. The film will be released on August 30th by the 101 Bison Company through the Universal Film Company.

MARION LEONARD FOR WARNER'S PROGRAM

Exhibitors and pictureplay fans the country over will rejoice to know that Marion Leonard, the gifted screen actress, is to be regularly featured in the program of Warner's Features, Inc.

S. E. V. Taylor, Miss Leonard's experienced director, is busily engaged in assembling a company of feature players and in getting the Brooklyn studio into shape for turning out three-reel pictures of merit.

DR. PORTER ENTERTAINING THE EDISON COMPANY AT SEARSPORT, MAINE

The above picture represents Dr. Porter and the Edison players, who are enjoying his hospitality, and it shows, in the order named, Richard Neill, Kugler (camera man), John Sturgeon, Frank McGlynn, Dr. Porter, Augustus Phillips, Bliss Milford, Mary Fuller, Elsie MacLeod, Walter Edwin and Harry Beaumont. Dr. Porter is a summer resident of Searsport who turned over his beautiful establishment to the Edison players, and has entertained them most royally during their stay. They have already completed "Joyce of the North Woods," a big two-reel story of the lumber camps, and "A Light on Troubled Waters," a seacoast story. Other interesting films are to follow, having as their background the picturesque woods and rugged coast of Maine.

WARNER'S FEATURES SECURES GILES R. WARREN

Giles R. Warren, well known to exhibitors through his connection with the Imp, Lubin, Powers and Victor film companies, has contracted to furnish Warner's Features, Inc., with a superior brand of three-reel features. In order to do this and do it well, he has associated himself with J. A. Whitman, whose studio at Cliffside, N. J., will be under the personal supervision of both Mr. Warren and Mr. Whitman, and will be used as the working basis for the new organization.

Mr. Warren announces that extensive preparations are under way for the production of a series of Sir Walter Scott's most celebrated novels. "The Lady of the Lake" has just been completed and the others to be produced are: "Rob Roy, "The Monastery," "The Abbot," "Guy Mannering" and "Waverley."

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

THE Inventors' Guild, composed exclusively of independent and experienced inventors—patentees, including such names as Pupin, Edison, Hewett, Weston, and scores of others of national and international repute, recently adopted the following, the whereas's being particularly pertinent, to-wit: WHEREAS: The advanced position of the United States among the nations of the world, as regards manufacturing and inventive progress, has been primarily due to the far-sighted provision in the United States Constitution under which improvement by invention was stimulated by granting Letters Patent for limited times.

WHEREAS: The hearings on the Oldfield Bill (H. R. 23,417) in the spring of 1912 demonstrated that there were marked differences of individual opinion among inventors, legislators, manufacturers, and patent lawyers, as to the changes in our patent system, which would be desirable to subserve the best interests of the United States.

WHEREAS: The intention of the United States Constitution to stimulate the publication of valuable inventive thought, by granting and securing an exclusive right to the inventor who first publishes his invention through the agency of a patent of the United States, seems to have been lost sight of in said Oldfield Bill (H. R. 1,700); and said proposed law would tend to reduce instead of tending to increase the creation and publication of inventions valuable to the people of the United States.

BE IT RESOLVED: That the Inventors' Guild does hereby invite each of the chambers of commerce, and similar representative organizations throughout the United States, to aid the Guild in its efforts to secure the appointment of a Patents Commission by urging the Congress of the United States that they provide for such a commission made up of unbiased, independent, non-partisan men of such national standing as will command the respect and confidence of the whole country; and chosen from different walks of life; and serving without pay. Said commission to hold public hearings, and otherwise, as may appear to them best, to make a thorough and careful study of the American patent situation, and to prepare and submit a comprehensive report and recommendations to Congress for such changes as may, as the result of their study, appear to them expedient whether in the Patent Office, in the method of court procedure, or in the organic Patent Law, and to submit recommendations as to the legislation they would propose for effecting such changes. And the Guild further requests the several chambers of commerce to urge the Congress that they make ample provision for the expenses of such a commission, and that they hold in abeyance all proposed legislation affecting the patent system in whatsoever way until such time as the said commission shall have had ample opportunity to hold the said hearings and make the said study and report.

The National Manufacturers' Association is using Mobile pictures and lantern slides in a propaganda re accident prevention; and a movement is under headway in Congress to establish a national museum of safety devices in Washington.

A composite lantern slide adapted for use in connection with Mobile picture shows, etc., is the subject of Patent No. 1,066,765, issued to Alexander S. Spiegel, of Chicago, Ill. The accompanying views represent, first, a face view of the slide, and, second, a partial view of the picture carrying member. The members of the slide are transparent, one carrying a screen of parallel lines, the other consisting of a plate having thereon groups of marks which make the different views of the object when the plate is shifted into different positions in relation to the screen section. These plates are connected together by flexible pieces, 3, at their vertical edges providing connections which allow relative movement of one plate in respect to the other in one direction, while at the same time the members will be held against displacement in the other direction, so that as the position of the members changes longitudinally, the groups of markings or broken lines will register properly with the open spaces between the opaque lines of the screen to produce the picture with an accurately defined outline. A distance piece, 4, of thin paper keeps the plates slightly separated, and may also serve as a mat. This slide is adapted to be placed in a carrier like that used in moving picture machines. The screen may carry a portion of the picture or not, as desired. This simple contrivance, together with accessories for manipulation purposes, is covered by a specification of 375 folios, containing 19 claims, the first and broadest of which pre-empts a composite lantern slide consisting of a transparent screen member having parallel lines with spaces between, and a transparent picture-carrying member relatively movable and made up of lines and spaces.

"Steam annihilated nine-tenths of distance"; and electricity, through cinematography, has cancelled the other tenth, bringing together the ends of the earth, practically taking people where they could never hope to go in person. Thus as knowledge becomes international, ignorance and isolation must disappear.

Under an act passed at the last session of the Philippine Legislature any patent or trade-mark registered in the United States Patent Office, upon being filed in the executive bureau of the Philippines and the fee for such purpose paid, shall receive the same protection as is accorded in the United States, and persons infringing such patent or trade-mark shall be liable to the same penalties. It is provided that the rights of property in patents and trade-marks secured in the Islands under the Spanish laws shall be respected as if such laws were in full force and effect.

Be it known that Thomas Buckland, a subject of the King of Great Britain, residing at "Lyndhurst," Stanley Road, Hunters Hill, near Sydney, in the State of New South Wales and Commonwealth of Australia, a glazier, has invented a new Photographic Washing Apparatus, for which he has been granted Letters Patent of the United States of America, said Letters Patent bearing the number 1,067,403. Fig. 1 is a perspective view of the washing tank (partly in section). Fig. 2 a similar view of the frame and one tray. The washing tank, 8, has a division, 9, to form a vertical end portion, 10, with a port, 11, from tank, 8, into the same at the bottom, and it has ports or orifices, 12 and 13, at its ends. The frame, 14, for holding the trays, 15, comprises angular corner pillars, 16, longitudinal connecting pieces, 17, and cross stays, 18, each top stay, 18, having a flange, 19, formed on it to serve as lifting and carrying members. The trays, 15, are shallow, having frames supporting a corrugated floor, on which are wire loops to prevent endwise movement of films or sheets thereon. And these trays, 15, have ports or openings at one end which are alternate when the trays are positioned in the frame, while at the other end are a plurality of small orifices to assist draining and to prevent air bubbles. In use, the negatives, films, sheets, prints, or the like, are placed in the trays, 15, fitted in the frame, 14, which is placed in the tank, 8, and water or chemical solution or other liquid caused to flow through said tank, 8, being fed in at either end and passing either upwardly or downwardly through the openings in the trays, 15, and overflowing through the opening, 12 or 13, as the case may be. Mr. Buckland claims, in combination a tank having inlet and outlet openings, a removable frame adapted to be positioned in said tank, and a plurality of superposed trays supported by said frame, adjacent trays having openings in their alternate ends. Also, in connection therewith, certain other specific details of construction.

Architect—Now, where would you prefer the drawing room, sir?

Mr. Strukile—Look here, young man, I've let you put up a smokin' room, when I don't smoke; a music room, when I couldn't play a mouth organ; a nursery, when I ain't got no nurse; and a pantry, when I don't pant. But I'm goin' to draw the line at a drawin' room, when I couldn't even draw a straight line.—Tit-Bits.

But a moving-picture parlor would have been O. K.

Patent No. 1,068,895, issued to Charles O. Harper, of Louisville, Ky., comprehends a camera provided with means for holding revoluble film spools, and provided with mechanism whereby the virtual length of such spools may be controlled at will, the exposure spaces of the camera being likewise controllable at will, so that the surface of film subjected to exposure may be brought into accord with the size of picture desired. The claim covers the combination with a camera for exposure of successive portions of continuous films, and having a plurality of peep holes spaced at different distances from one of its edges in a direction extending lengthwise of the films for the purpose of registering with successive legends carried by said films, as said films are moved into successive positions for exposure, of film holders mounted within said camera and adjustable for accommodating films of different widths, and a plurality of interchangeable shields severally provided each with an opening of a different length measured in the general direction of the length of the films, the length of the opening in each shield corresponding to the spacing of the legends carried by a particular film.

Patent Pendant. A seasonable fantastic invention by Canis Familiaris, of Hoboken, N. J. Consists essentially in the utilization of terminal facilities for simultaneously raising the wind and swatting flies. This double function is attained by grafting the stem of a palm leaf onto the caudal appendix—an operation calculated to make any dog laugh, thereby automatically superinducing the exquisite reflex undulatory motion of the protruding end of the spinal column. This is only a beginning in the conservation of a natural force heretofore practically ignored—if not actually cur-tailed.

Photographical Magazine gives the results of an investigation by Prof. Herbert E. Ives into the photometric effects of lights of different colors. The method of equality of brightness is one of the methods of light measurement applied to differently colored lights. On adjacent portions of a photometric (measure of light) screen as a background, two lights are projected, the relative intensities of illumination from the two being changed until the two different colored fields give a sensation of equal brightness, when the illuminations are said to be equal. This method of acuity of sight is merely the way of proving two colors equal when the same fineness of detail is just distinguishable by each, while the method of critical frequency holds that two illuminations are equal when the flicker produced by rapid alternation of one illumination with black disappears at the same speed of alternation as the other. Two illuminants are also said to be equal when upon rapidly alternating one with the other no sensation of flicker results. The speed of alternation is such that the slightest change of either will cause a flicker. The Doctor discovered that the best standard must center around the flicker and the equality of brightness of the colors. Hence, he then determined by the two methods the degrees of luminosity of the various tints and colors of the spectrum. He found that the flicker method is much more sensitive than the equality of brightness method, particularly when colored lights are concerned. The result with the flicker method is more easily reproduced than with the equality of brightness plan.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

MALING DRESSES FAMOUS PLAYERS

A rather unique arrangement is the reason for this item. Some time ago the Famous Players Film Company engaged exclusively for their purposes the house of A. E. Lawrence, one of the best theatrical costume concerns in the business and the oldest one in New York City. This concern consented to devote all its stock, costumes and make-up to the needs of the Famous Players, and E. V. Maling, who had been its manager for ten years, transferred his headquarters to the Famous Players studio, where he has since been busy dressing the characters in the successful manner so universally recognized. Mr. Maling is one of the oldest and best known theatrical costumers in the country, has an expert knowledge of his work, and is an authority on all matters of dress. He has supervised the costuming of some of the biggest shows on Broadway, and always obtains creditable results.

SOLAX

A TERRIBLE NIGHT (August 27).—Mr. and Mrs. Brown, going out for the evening, leave their daughter, Vinnie, alone in the house. Later, her brother, Darwin, comes home unexpectedly. Having no door key, and ringing in vain (as Vinnie is afraid to answer the bell), he climbs in the window. Hearing noises downstairs, Vinnie thinks it is a burglar. Very much frightened, she locks her door and prepares to let herself down out of the window on bedclothes tied together. Tom comes upstairs and finds the door locked. Then, hearing her open the window, he in turn thinks her a burglar, and goes out of another window in pursuit. Mr. and Mrs. Brown return, and all kinds of complications ensue, and they all finish up in the prison cell charged with being burglars.

A CHILD'S INTUITION (August 29).—Albert Wade, in a spirit of anger, leaves home, declaring: "I will never write to parents or return." He goes to New York and secures work. Some years later his father dies, and in time his mother is compelled to go out into the world to make her living.

Albert prospers, falls in love with Helen Hoskins and marries. Helen's mother makes her home with Albert and his wife.

Mr. and Mrs. Wade are very fond of society life, so the children are, in a way, neglected, and grandmother is their constant companion. One day the grandmother is taken ill and dies. The two children are heartbroken. Grandmother's clothes are folded and placed in a trunk and taken to the attic.

Mr. and Wade are off on a trip. Frances, grieving over her grandmother, slips alone into grandmother's room, and while there, a vision of her grandmother sitting in a chair appears; the expression of child changes to that of joy. As she holds out her arms to her, the vision disappears, and the child falls forward in the chair and is found by the nurse in an unconscious condition. The doctor is summoned, finds the child with a raging fever and in a serious condition. Parents notified. The child in her delirium calls for grandmother. Doctor fails to restore her to consciousness. Louise, two years older, distressed over her sister's illness, stands at bed trying to arouse child. She looks up suddenly with a startled expression; smiles, stoops, kisses sister, turns and leaves room. Doctor and nurse look after her with surprise. She takes up hat, goes out alone in street. After walking several blocks, she sees old lady selling shoestrings and matches on the corner, and asks: "Please come home with me and be my little sick sister's grandmother!" Touched at the child's tears, she consents, and Louise pulls her along in her hurry and joy.

They enter the home unnoticed, and the old lady is taken to grandmother's room. Louise runs to the attic, opens grandmother's trunk, takes out her dress, cap and slippers, hastens back to the old lady, who is given the clothes. She changes clothes as child tips to the sick child's room, where doctor and nurse are watching the little one with serious faces. The parents, in street apparel, rush in with excitement, as the doctor motions silence. They look down at the child with distressing look. Doctor rises, motions them to leave the room with him. They leave the nurse and Louise alone. Nurse leaves also. Louise tips to door of grandmother's room, enters, starts with surprise at old lady standing before her. She takes her hand, and they enter the sick room and to the bed. Old lady stands looking down at child's face in deep study; stoops, kisses cheek; caresses her head, as Louise stands at the side of the bed. ?

Parents step to door with doctor and nurse. All start with surprise at the scene before them. Doctor motions silence. Those at the bed do not see them. The old lady, still caressing child. Her touch seems to arouse her. She moves, opens her eyes, looks into the face of old lady bending over her. A faint smile; she holds up her two little arms, as the old lady drops on her knees at bed; the little arms are folded around her neck as she lays her cheek against the child's. Louise claps her hands with joy. The doctor and parents stand with a look of wonder at the scene, step in room and to the bedside with smiling faces. Louise tells them what she had done, as they take her in their arms and caress her. The old lady seems oblivious to her surroundings. The child falls asleep; the doctor takes her little hand, feeling pulse, smiles, touches old lady's shoulder, gently helps her to her feet as the mother steps to her to express her gratitude. The old lady smiles at the sleeping child, kisses brow, rises, turns with happy face. The old lady looks up and into the handsome face of the man who stands with eyes on her with a look of most startled surprise. The old lady pushes the mother aside, staggers forward into the arms of her long-lost boy. He folds her to him tenderly, while wife and all look on with surprise. He then tells them that it was his own dear mother, and the children's real grandmother. Louise dances with joy, as she is taken to grandmother's heart.

RAMO

THE WORKER (Three Reels, September 1).—Dissatisfied with conditions at Bradford Mills, the workers protest in vain against the long hours and starvation wages. James Bradford, the autocratic owner, repeatedly refuses to meet their demands, and the natural consequences is a threatened strike.

Bradford's son, Jack, finding home associations disagreeable since his father's second marriage, goes to the city, and the gay life of the cafes and restaurants finds in him, wealthy and alone, a constant and somewhat reckless supporter. The father of Madge Dale, his fiancee, threatens to break off their engagement, and this, coupled with his father's illness and Madge's attitude, moves Jack to return home.

The strike is called. This, together with a bad heart attack brought on by the accidental shooting of Jameson, one of the most violent workers, causes Mr. Bradford's death. This state of affairs greets Jack on his return; and now by his father's will, being the owner of the mills and the bulk of his father's money, he straightway opens the mills and endeavors to relieve the dire poverty caused by the strike. Jack's stepmother, who is practically ignored by the will, plans with her brother to ruin Jack and dominate the mills.

Jack makes frequent rounds of the poverty-stricken section in his endeavor to better the workers' conditions, the sickness of Mrs. Jameson's little child calling him frequently to her house. In this, the stepmother sees an opportunity to strike at Jack through Jameson, counting on his jealousy, and she causes a false rumor concerning these visits to reach Jameson. She also shows an innocent letter from Mrs. Jameson to Jack so torn by her as to read like a love note. Jameson is fooled, and seeing Jack again with his wife, loses his head and attacks Jack.

Fearing a fatal result from his act, Jameson forces his way into the stepmother's house, seeking aid and protection from her, but she, frightened at his wild appearance and in the endeavor to evade him, falls down the stairs. Jameson, half dazed with this latest catastrophe and Jack's unexpected appearance, is apprehended. Jack thereupon learns of Jameson's motive for the attack, and the stepmother, frightened and injured, admits the plot. Jameson returns to work at Jack's request, a stauncher and wiser worker. Jack receives full credit from Madge for keeping his promise to be a worker.

LOVE AND GOLD (August 13).—Mary Benson lives with her grandfather, a miserly old man, who compels her to bring home her wages to him. She is taken ill at her work and returns home only to be accused by her grandfather of feigning illness, and is ordered from the house. Mary leaves, and faints at the entrance of the Landers' home, and is assisted into the house by Jack Landers, who persuades his father to allow her to remain with them until she recovers. Jack's father disapproves of the growing attachment between Jack and Mary, as he wishes Jack to marry an heiress. Overhearing Jack and his father discussing this topic, Mary leaves rather than have Jack oppose his father's wishes.

Mary learns of the sudden illness of the old miser, and rushes home only to be followed by Jack. Jack's father, now thoroughly aroused, follows Jack to the miser's home, determined to put a stop to the affair.

The old miser, in his delirium, sees his gold turn to dross, and on regaining his senses, appreciates the nothingness of gold and the allness of love, and when Jack's father arrives and intimates that the miser's grandaughter is unacceptable because of poverty, the miser discloses that his granddaughter is in reality a very rich girl. Jack and Mary are married.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY (August 18).

NAPOLEON WIFFLES, ESQ. (August 19.—Wiffles, who is running neck and neck with Max Linder, as the funniest man in the pictures, has a new one this week for his many admirers. His sweetheart, who idolizes the great Napoleon, is forever pleading with Wiffles to emulate the general's example. One day Wiffles dreams he is the famous Corsican. It is then that the fun begins. After reviewing the Grand Army Napoleon Wiffles jumps into a taxi and hurries his forces to the assault at the pyramids. For his assistance the taxi driver is decorated with the Legion of Honor. Any one could be amusing with the opportunities the story offers, but no one could equal the work of Wiffles, whose enactment of the role of Napoleon is a scream from start to finish.

STRANGE TRAITS OF SERPENTS (August 20).—This picture is made for the purpose of diffusing knowledge about the reptiles which terrorize every one. The study is conducted under the direction of Dr. Ditmars, Curator of Reptiles in the New York Zoo, whose ability in this direction is unquestioned. The snakes that are deadly are shown, and their characteristics are pointed out, and the harmless snakes are accounted for in the same manner. The information furnished is reliable and at the same time of intense interest. A little animal inhabiting India, the Mongoose, is the enemy of all snakes and afraid of none. The film culminates with a picture showing the little fellow in a bitter and exciting struggle to prove his mastery of a reptile that has challenged him.

AUTO-POLO (August 20.—The newest dare-devil game which has taken the public by storm is the novel subject of this film. There are four autos engaged in the game, and these cars sweep about the field after the ball at a speed that is alarming, the malletmen seeming regardless of their danger in their efforts to win, leaning perilously out of the car for a stroke while it turns on two wheels, stops, races backwards across the field at a speed that will make your hair stand on end even to watch.

PATHE'S WEEKLY (August 21).

STUNG (August 21).—An inn-keeper who has the money for the rent tells the landlord that he hasn't, because he, the inn-keeper, wants to chance the kale on a prizefight. After the landlord has gone, the inn-keeper flashes his roll. A tramp tries to lift it. The hotel man lifts the tramp under the chin and then runs for the sheriff. The sheriff meanwhile is coming to arrest the inn-keeper on the landlord's complaint of non-payment of rent. They find the tramp, who swears that the hotel man has robbed him. The sheriff continues his search for the inn-keeper. While he is gone the tramp drinks his fill at the bar and then departs on the back of a donkey. He falls asleep and after wandering around for a while the donkey comes home to the inn. The sheriff has compelled the hotel-keeper to pay his rent, and when the tramp comes back the inn-keeper wakes him up and the tramp gets stung, believe us.

THE LIZARD (August 22).—This film treats the common little animal known as the lizard in a manner that leaves none of its characteristics unexplained. The order is divided into twenty-one families, with over 1,600 species, but the specimens used to illustrate this educational picture are the commonest of the tribe and, therefore, the most interesting to the average man. The lizard is tracked to its native haunt, a tuft of grass in a quiet glade, and followed on a hunt for its breakfast. It meets with a caterpillar, its favorite dish. Many of these little reptiles are trained, which can easily be done, and become great pets. It proves its value as an assistant to the farmer when it uses its sharp claws to climb trees where it plays havoc with the small insects which annually destroy millions of dollars' worth of vegetation.

A VISIT TO THE RUINS OF POMPEII.—A tour of the ancient city buried by the ashes of Vesuvius in A.D. 79 is the subject of the latter half of this reel. Recent scientific excavation has brought the buried city to light and the spectator is enabled to gaze with wonderment on the curious sights which this phenomena occasioned. Everything within the city remains and only the natives are gone; in the interior a bake-house is seen where the mills are ready to grind the grain and the oven awaits the fagots, the vats used by a dyer remain intact, and the villas behold their gardens blossoming again. This film is, unquestionably, the happiest combination of entertainment and education ever devised and is bound to please.

THE MEXICAN GAMBLER (August 23).—Clara Eldridge is the apple of her father's eye, and the real ruler of his extensive ranch. One of the boys employed by her father is in love with Clara, and his attentions are as welcome as the flowers in May. Everything goes well for the young people until Eldridge is double-crossed by a Mexican gambler who swindles the rancher with the aid of a confederate. Eldridge must pay a debt, but has no money with which to meet it. He requests a loan of the Mexican, and the latter agrees provided Eldridge will help him win Clara's love. The father agrees and after explaining the situation to his daughter, she submits her heart. She leaves with the Mexican for a parson's, and while she is gone Eldridge learns of the swindle by which he lost his money. Led by Clara's young lover, a posse find the Mexican and justice is meted out to him in a manner that provides a novel punch.

THOSE TROUBLESOME TRESSES (August 19).—Seeing an amusing exhibition of jealousy between a farmer and his wife, the Joneses and the Millers start a great argument as to whether man or woman is the more liable to that complaint.

Talking over the matter in the house, the two women plan a trick on their husbands to see whether or not they are jealous. Fake love letters are to be written and posted to themselves. Unfortunately, neither of the ladies notices that the men overhear their talk.

Jones and Miller have a great laugh together, and agree to try some of that tricky business themselves. They go to a stable at the rear of their property and manage to get some light and dark-colored horsehair. Fastening the hairs to resemble curls, they place them so that their wives will find them and grow suspicious.

At breakfast time the next morning the letters arrive addressed to the ladies, who are greatly disappointed when their husbands do not display any interest in finding out from whom they have come. When, after the men have gone to business, Mrs. Jones finds a curl in her husband's coat pocket, she is in despair, and rushes to the house of Mrs. Miller to tell her the news. Mrs. Miller is aghast when she hears of Jones' conduct, and gives his wife all her sympathy, but congratulates herself that her husband, anyway, is faithful to her. She sings a song of a different tune later on in the morning when she finds a similar curl, of a different color, in an envelope locked in her husband's desk.

The two women resolve to at once go home to their mothers. They are met as they come out of the house by Jones and Miller, who have become afraid of the consequences, and have come home to explain things. Explanations are soon made, but the argument begins all over again. Neither side has proven its contention.

THE ADVENTURES OF A WATCH (August 26).—Hal Collins has just presented his fiancee, Marion Franks, with an engagement ring, sealing the compact with a kiss. Her mother comes in at this point, bringing a watch which she fastens to Marion's waist to match the ring. In an engagement party that follows she loses the watch, which is picked up by Homer Wilson, a dissipated young man, who recognizes it as belonging to Marion. She is alone in the sitting room when he approaches her and presents the watch. She is more than delighted, and gives him a rose from her hair. Coincident with this, Hal comes in, and his jealousy turns love to hatred. He demands his ring back; and, although Marion tries to explain, he refuses to listen. A few days later, Marion, out shopping, again loses her watch. This time it is picked up by a little boy, the son of a drunkard—Tom Babbitt. He shows the watch to his father, who immediately confiscates it and then sells it to a pawnbroker. Marion, having lost both her engagement ring and her watch, is much distressed.

Old Mr. Morton, the uncle of the dissipated young man who originally restored the watch to Marion, worrying over his nephew's bad habits, disinherits him. Previously he has visited the pawnbroker's and purchased Marion's watch. He concludes it would be a nice present for her, little knowing that she was the original owner. He is taken suddenly and seriously ill, but, admiring the girl, makes her the sole beneficiary under his will, and additionally sends her the watch. Just about this time Hal Collins finds out he has been very much mistaken about Marion; they are reunited, and all goes well, as the restored watch ticks comfort for confidence.

AMERICAN

FROM THE PORTALS OF DESPAIR (August 28).—On the outskirts of a small Western town lived John and his wife and child. John was very fond of his wife, and a little jealous, too; in fact quite jealous of their nearest neighbor, a Mexican half-breed. The Mexican was very fond of the baby, and often came over to see it. One day the husband, returning home, found the half-breed and his wife talking in the door-yard. He became very angry and forbade the wife to talk to the half-breed again.

John goes prospecting, and wife and baby bid him good-bye. Several days pass and she receives no word from him. The baby becomes ill, and she begs a man from a ranch some distance away, who was going in to town, to please ask the doctor to come to see the baby. Hearing the baby crying, she returns to the house to begin her lonely watch. The man goes to the doctor's, but finds he is out. The baby grows worse very rapidly. The mother is very nearly crazy and spends the time going in and out watching for the doctor. After one trip to the yard to look, she returns to the house to find the baby dead.

The awful shock and nervous strain turn the poor mother's brain. Picking up the child, she rushes out of the house, and goes to the Mexican's hut. After putting the baby in a box, she wanders away.

Meantime, the husband, finding no gold, returns to his home. Arriving, he finds no trace of his wife or child. He goes to the half-breed's hut to see if they have been seen. In front of the hut he finds his wife's bonnet, which she had dropped on entering the hut with the dead baby. He finds the half-breed out, and decides to wait and see him.

The wife, still wandering around, sinks down, very tired, sees a camping outfit, and goes to see it. She finds a man and wife in the camp, and gazes at them with a vacant stare. Then she wanders to the wagon in which a child is sitting. Putting her arms around the child, she picks him up, looking at it with a puzzled expression. The mother of the child is afraid the woman may harm her boy, and stands near her. Still holding the child, she looks up and gradually the horror dawns on her, and she remembers the loss of her own child. She drops the child, which the mother catches, and starts for home. Arriving there, she remembers that she has left her baby at the half-breed's hut, and goes in search of it.

Meantime, the half-breed has returned home, and the husband accuses him of hiding his wife. They quarrel, and come to blows. The husband hits the Mexican, knocking him down. He turns to look for his wife in another room and sees the baby in the box. The half-breed picks up a rifle and starts to hit the husband when he, too, sees the baby. Just at this moment the wife opens the door and staggers into the room. The husband and half-breed become friends at baby's grave, and do all in their power to rescue the mother from the portals of despair.

JACK MEETS HIS WATERLOO (August 30).—Jack Kirken, a handsome young chap, visits his father's friends on a cattle ranch. His genial disposition makes him very popular with the girls of the little town, and, when, after a three months' sojourn, he is appointed deputy sheriff, he is in the height of favor.

Sallie Newman, the village belle, returns home from school in a distant city, and learns all about the sheriff from the girls.

Bill Acres, Sallie's old sweethtart, endeavors to renew his attentions, and meeting with little success, of course, holds Jack's charms responsible. Sallie is fancy free and believes she is Cupid-proof.

Jack chided Bill about his jealousy, and elicited a wager that he would not dare to kiss Sallie. Jack won his bet, but also secured a slap in the face, and a reprimand on the head of it. Sallie regrets her fit of temper and so expresses herself to Bill. This further arouses the animosity of Bill, and he plots against Jack.

His plan is to place strange cattle in the corral of James Newman, Sallie's father, which would cause a breach between Newman and the sheriff, and in this manner put Jack in disfavor with Sallie. The plot seems to work out to Bill's great delight, and he magnanimously offers to stand by Newman in an attack by the sheriff's forces, but the shrewdness of the deputy sheriff discloses the facts, and Bill is taken into custody.

Jack and Sallie become warmer friends than ever. Sallie offers to take back the slap, which Jack promptly agrees to return, but in a decidedly more pleasing manner.

THE RAG BAG (August 22).—An industrious rag man, while calling up the alleys for trade, disturbs the slumbers of two tramps who are taking a nap. They awaken, and, seizing the rag man, caution him not to make so much noise. He consents and goes his way, but not very far. He calls again, and again disturbs the tramps. They are very angry, and determine to be revenged. Following in the path that the rag man has taken, they find that he has left his bag outside of a gate while he is in buying rags. They appropriate the bag, and start on the run, arriving at a freight yard. They decide that the smaller of the two shall get in the bag and cover himself with rags and the larger tramp will take the bag to a junk man and sell it. Then, when the opportunity offers, the little fellow is to cut the bag with a knife and escape. All goes well, and the bag is accordingly sold, and the big tramp, forgetting his companion, goes in a saloon to enjoy himself. In the meantime the rag man has come out of the gate, and seeing that his bag is gone, starts in pursuit. He picks up the trail where the larger tramp has knocked down several persons with his heavy burden, and they are very much enraged at being so brutally treated by the fellow with the bag. He proceeds to the junk yard; the bag with the little tramp inside is still on the scales. When the rag man questions the junk man the bag starts to move. They become alarmed, and start to kick the bag along the street. Women who have been knocked down by the tramp have by this time secured a policeman, and seeing the junk man and rag man kicking the bag, they rush to the spot, which happens to be in front of a saloon where the big tramp is waiting. The bag is opened; the little tramp is captured. At this moment the big tramp appears from the saloon and is taken into custody with his smaller companion, and the junk man and rag man and the crowd all enjoy a good laugh.

TINY TIM AND THE ADVENTURES OF HIS ELEPHANT (August 12).—"Boys will be boys," runs the old saw, but to very few boys does the opportunity occur of separating an elephant from its owners and "painting the town red" in company with the pachydermous quadruped. The audacity of such a course appeals to Tiny Tim, who, in the course of his wanderings, discovers an elephant of about his own tender years. Both are in the mischievous period of life, and what follows is typical of irresponsible youth.

Tracking down the encampment when night falls, Tiny Tim persuades the animal to join him, and, with the aid of a ladder, mounts his steed. Tiny Tim christens his new-found friend "John Willy," and together they set off on a voyage of discovery. Feeling rather hungry, they find the contents of a street-vender's stall an irresistible temptation. Over it goes, and the apples and pears disappear with unwonted celerity. A minute later the sentry at the armory gets a shock as the elephant romps past, and Mr. Sentry goes through a great gymnastic stunt before calling out the guard.

At the corner of the next block, a "blind" man, comfortably ensconced in a push-cart, views their approach with great distress, and makes a prompt getaway. Tim takes the vacant chair and sticks the "Blind" sign onto the ear of his companion. The sympathy they arouse brings in a shower of money, and presently they move along further. And now John Willy gets it into his head to "start something." Tim's motto is "Plenty of Push," and their progress through the busy streets is full of alarms and hairbreadth escapes.

During a breathing spell, hunger once more assails John Willy, and this time he seeks a lunch in a restaurant, with dire results to the fixtures and fittings and the well-laden tables. But an end must come to such capers as these, and it would seem that John Willy and his self-appointed keeper must suffer the humiliation of abject capture, when the appearance of a lady, who is a prominent member of the S. P. C. A., brings peace, food, and happiness to our duo of wanderers. The lady takes both of them home, where they are treated like millionaires, and they enjoy the good things of life to the very full.

This is a film which will make the youngsters shriek with delight, and convulse the oldsters in every audience.

On the same reel:

THE LAKES OF SALZBURG (Austria).—Salzburg, a crown-land of Austria, lies on the northern face of the eastern Alps. The southern portion of the country and its lakes form the subject of this film. Starting from the picturesque village of Ebensee, at the lower extremity of Lake Gmunden, one of the most beautiful lakes in Europe, we make our way by boat to the Chateau of Ort, which is built on an island.

Quite a different type of natural beauty is presented by the Lake of Hallstadt, which, lost in the mountains, presents a wild and melancholy aspect. The litle town of Hallstadt is as curious to the tourist as it is pleasing, and the film as a whole is admirable.

LUX

OVER THE GARDEN WALL (A Funny Lux Comic. August 22).—The amusing adventures of a young gentleman who lived next door to a ladies' boarding school. He falls in love with one of the mistresses and incurs trouble thereby. It is a very funny episode—and much laughter will be caused when the bulldog of the seminary chases the young gentleman over the garden wall.

BRONCHO BILLY'S MISTAKE (August 23).—Broncho Billy, a woodsman, living in northern Montana, is greeted by Paul Harding, an artist from New York City. Harding presents Broncho Billy with a letter of introduction. The newcomer is taken into the rough Western home, and is told to make his headquarters there until he has finished with his painting. Harding sees in Broncho Billy's wife an excellent subject for oils, and is given consent to paint her portrait. Harding takes a deep interest in the woman, and not only teaches her how to read and write, but gives her a thorough knowledge of worldly things in general. Some time later, Harding receives a telegram demanding that he return to his home immediately, that his mother is critically ill. Broncho Billy's wife takes Harding to the railroad station in her buggy. Broncho Billy gets wind of his wife driving away with Harding, and comes to the untimely conclusion that she is eloping with the artist. Harding is overtaken by Broncho Billy, and a fierce struggle ensues. Things are straightened out to the satisfaction of Broncho Billy when his wife explains the true situation. The men shake hands and promise to be friends always.

RELIANCE

COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENSE (August 20).—Hugh, a gay young blade from college, is given a place in his father's law office in the hope that he will settle down and make something of himself. But one night, while at a roof garden with some friends, he meets Eloise Grizell, a beautiful singer. It is love at first sight. They marry and telegraph to his father. Furious at his son's marrying a cafe singer, the proud old attorney promptly disowns him, although it almost breaks his heart. For a time the couple are extremely happy, and then their funds run low. Hugh becomes worried. Eloise tries to cheer him. She offers to go back on the stage, but he will not allow this. As weeks go by, his passion wanes, and, taking to drink, and associating with evil companions, he soon losts every vestige of manhood. He is not even uplifted by the birth of his child. He soon deserts them, and Eloise, ill and starving, is forced to get a position in a third-rate music hall, leaving her baby with a kind person. Nightly she dances. One night, Hugh happens into the music hall, and attracted by her grace, attempts to embrace her. She resists, and a mutual recognition follows. He taunts her before all, and she, in a fury, stabs him with the stiletto she is using in the dance. She is placed on trial for crime, but withholds the name of her victim for the sake of his family. Her case attracts the attention of Lawyer Barrington, the great criminal lawyer, and he offers his services for the defense. As they had never met, she does not ask his name, and there is no recognition. He wins her case and she is acquitted. Getting her babe, she goes to the lawyer's home to thank him. Their identity is then discovered, and he, furious at her confession, snatches the child from her and turns her out of the house. Eloise decides to end it all, and goes to the park. She is about to end her misery in the waters of the lagoon when Barrington, repentant, restrains her. He tells her the babe needs a mother's love, and that they will go far away from the scene of their common sorrow and start anew.

SUCCESS (August 23).—Allan Brooks receives back his play from the managers, rejected, and returns to his studio, convinced that life is a failure, and that he will end it. Edith Mason, the girl who loves him, is an artist of no talent, but a strong and brave girl. While consoling him, her hand touches the pistol in his pocket, and she gets it away from him. She tells him that success is not in money, but in a man's heart and soul. He does not agree, and declares he would sell his soul for success. She is horrified. Then a letter is brought in, stating that his manuscript had been returned by mistake, and he should call at once. Both are delighted. Bert, a young doctor, is in love with Edith, but she prefers Allan. The opening night of Allan's play arrives, and the three attend the performance, which is a great success. Allan is called upon to make a speech, and behind the scenes meets the beautiful leading lady. The manager and she try to urge him to go to a supper with them, but he refuses, remembering the girl he left in the box. He returns to Bert and Edith, and, getting an idea, he asks Bert to see Edith home, as he has to see the manager. Edith is sorely disappointed, which Bert sees, but he willingly offers to attend to her. The two go to a cafe, and there see Allan in company of the leading lady and the manager. He merely nods to them. Bert sees Edith's distress, and offers to take her home, where she sobs out her grief. Later, Allan decides to give a dinner in honor of all the successes of the town. Edith, unable to sell her pictures, obtains work in an art shop painting dinner cards, etc. Allan sends in an order for cards, which Edith is told by the manager to deliver to his house. She is forced to do so. She arrives at Allan's home, and feeling faint, is told by his secretary to sit down and rest. Meanwhile, the dinner is taking place in the next room, with much noise and drinking. Allan then suggests that a failure be brought in to them as a contrast. The secretary, at a loss for a moment, remembers the girl outside, and drags her into the dining room against her will. They all drink to the failure, while visions of such failures as Edgar Allan Poe, Nathan Hale, Robert E. Lee and others appear on the wall. As the great cross of Calvary appears, one by one the guests steal out, realizing that failure is not lack of gold, and that these great men were once called failures. Allan looks at Edith, then falls across the table. Edith quickly summons Bert, who arrives almost immediately. They look at Allan. He is dead. Bert then leads her out, and Allan lies alone in his deserted banquet hall.

FLOOD TIDE.—When Sydney Brandon, passing through a little Cornish town on a walking tour, dropped into the Lee household to beg a glass of cold milk, he suddenly discovered that he would much rather stay in that same little Cornish town than continue his journey. It may be said that it was because the milk was very good, or because the coast was the most beautiful in Cornwall—and then again it may be that it was because Connie Lee had a pair of remarkably pretty eyes.

However that may be it is quite certain that Joe Muzzey in a short time wished that Brandon were anywhere except in Cornwall. For Connie Lee, who had never loved Joe, now refused to have anything to do with him whatever, and spent all her time with the attractive stranger.

Brandon met Joe one morning and asked him if the tide came over a certain ledge from which he particularly wanted to make some sketches. Although he knew that the rising tide would mean almost certain death to anybody upon the ledge in question, Joe assured his rival that it was safe.

A few hours later Connie, worried over Brandon's absence, went down to the shore to look for him. To her horror, when she reached the top of the cliffs, she discovered Brandon far below her, his retreat cut off by the advancing waters, rushing madly about the narrow ledge in an attempt to discover a means of escape.

By a lucky chance Connie discovered a long rope nearby, which she lowered to Brandon. But in his attempts to escape Brandon had sprained his wrist and he could not climb up the rope unaided. At this crisis Joe Muzzey presented himself to the frantic girl above. He would save Brandon, he said, if she would marry him. Wild with indignation she refuses him, and finally, spurred by the fearful danger of her lover, she slid down the rope herself. Temporarily mad, Muzzey cut the rope.

It is easy enough to say in mere words that Connie scaled an almost impassable cliff with the disabled Brandon and that the two lovers forgive the delirious Muzzey. It is a little harder to express our admiration for the nerve and daring of the two actors who actually made that daring ascent and by so doing have assured this film of success.

KLEINE-ECLIPSE

THE CLOWN'S REVENGE (Two Reels) (Aug. 19).—In love with an acrobat's wife, the clown seeks her in the dressing-room and makes violent love. The acrobat, returning from his daring "leap for life," finds them together and incurs the everlasting enmity of the clown.

Plotting a diabolical revenge, the clown takes advantage of the unfortunate sickness of the acrobat's four-year-old child. Hearing first of the child's death, the clown stops the acrobat just as the latter is about to make his famous leap and tells him the heart-breaking news. The acrobat hesitates; his nerve fails him; the crowd hoots and hisses "coward"; the ring manager orders him on with the performance. With a heart heavy with grief, dazed by the news, the acrobat makes his frightful leap, crashing down into the boxes to destruction.

THE HUMAN BRIDGE (Two Reels) (Aug. 26).—Distinctly a story of adventure. A tale of the rush for gold and the merciless persecutions of avaricious settlers in their efforts to learn the place of discovery. Into the fabric of adventure has been woven the skeins of a dainty love story, of a love begun lightly, almost in jest, and ending in sincere and heroic self-sacrifice.

"The Human Bridge" gets its name from a stirring bit of action in which, pursued by an implacable enemy, the settlers find themselves confronted by a yawning cleft in the hills—a chasm which they span with their own bodies, allowing the girl to cross in safety—a daring and highly sensational feat you are certain to enjoy.

ECLAIR

THE BETTER FATHER (Aug. 27).—Eleanor Curzon, the beautiful wife of a successful business man, was devoted to her baby boy, Joe. Mr. Curzon loved little Joe also, but the thoughts uppermost in his mind was Eleanor's remarkable fascination for men. So obsessed was he with this idea that he could not realize that her indifference was as fixed as were the men's attentions. Eleanor had given the baby to Nurse at bedtime and was smiling over his new tricks of the day when she received a letter. On opening it she learned that her scapegoat brother was again in trouble and needing money. He demanded that she meet him in the garden with it that night, bolstering up the demand with a threat to reveal himself—the blot on the family 'scutcheon—to Eleanor's husband. Eleanor had no choice; she slipped into the garden late that night and gave him the money. He was so grateful that he kissed her. Edward Curzon, watching from the open French windows, saw this. To him it could mean but one thing: Eleanor had a lover and had betrayed him, her husband. On her return to the house he tried to force a confession from her, but Eleanor was adamant, and the misunderstanding caused by a molehill became a mountain between them.

Al Bender, a "second story" man by force of circumstances, made a nocturnal visit to the Curzon home. Mr. Curzon, sitting in the dark library, suddenly became aware of an alien presence. He flashed on the light, catching Bender unawares. Finding it to be a burglar, and not his wife's lover, he decided to use the circumstance for his own purpose. He offered Bender a large sum of money to take his baby away and lose its identity. Bender reluctantly accepted the charge. Eleanor, coming in during the night to see if baby was sleeping comfortably, was stunned to find it gone. Her husband stonily told her she would never see it again. She fell in a merciful swoon.

With the money received from baby's father, Bender returned to his favored occupation of poolroom betting, engaging Frank Morton as a runner. The poolroom was raided. Bender escaped, but Morton was arrested. Following a tip, the police released Morton in order to catch Bender, who was badly wanted for another crime. They shadowed Morton, and did get on the track of Bender, who, after giving Morton a staggering blow for betraying him, led the police a hard chase through cellars, along alleys, over rooftops and down rickety fire-escapes before they caught him. When Morton came to, he found the mysterious baby whom Bender had been fathering and, moved to pity by its tiny fingers, groping so helplessly at a hard, cold world, decided to adopt it.

The years flew by. Morton worked steadily as a quarryman, and little Joe grew out of long dresses into short, and out of rompers into trousers. Daddy took him to school every day, and he prepared supper for daddy every afternoon after school. But one day daddy did not come. Instead, an officer came, who took Joe to the hospital, where he found his beloved daddy swathed in bandages and barely able to talk. There had been a mistimed blasting at the quarry which caught Morton and disabled him. Joe, like the little man he was, immediately set out to earn money for himself and daddy by selling papers. At night he slept in the newsboys' lodging house, any large crate, and by day he skimped and starved to buy daddy luxuries, such as tobacco and a pipe, from his meagre pennies.

In the Curzons' now luxurious home a prematurely gray-haired young woman spent her days gazing at her lost baby's picture, although a golden-haired little girl tugged at her skirts. Eleanor's husband had never forgiven her until one day a telegram came telling of her brother's death in a shooting fray. Then he knew how cruelly he had misjudged her, and every hour was spent in vainly trying to make restitution. He came in joyously one day, bearing a letter from a clergyman saying that Al Bender, a criminal, had confessed on his deathbed that the child he had spirited away years ago could be found if they would try to locate Frank Morton.

So it was that the advertisement asking for information of Frank Morton caught the bright eyes of little Joe. He hurriedly called at the address given, and found himself crushed to the heart of the loveliest lady he had ever seen. He did not understand at first, until father went with him to daddy. But it troubled him to see daddy shaking with sobs.

By and by daddy became well and called to see little Joe at father's home. Daddy could not talk, for some reason or other, and little Joe wanted him to stay there with them. He told mother so. She told father. And in some wonderful way it was all arranged. So the lucky little fellow had two fathers. Which was the better?

NESTOR

WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE (Aug. 25).—A page from life—a Wall Street story of the all-absorbing struggle for gold.

Young John Burton, a successful broker, loves Ramona McCullon, daughter of a king of finance. His entire fortune, save a few hundred dollars is tied up in the unstable and ever-changing stocks and bonds.

Old Howard McCullon, seeing a chance to add millions to his already overflowing coffers, reckons not on the downfall of others and "bears" the markets until hundreds of smaller brokers are caught in the whirlpool and ruined.

John Burton is among these, and as he sees his fortune evaporating, he rushes to McCullon and begs him to desist. Old McCullon, cold and unresponsive as his own gold, tells him the policy which has made the McCollon name a power is to crush everything which proved an obstacle to success. Burton, heartsick, turns to leave when he meets Ramona. The sight of her causes his just anger to rise and he tells McCullon that the time will come when he may find that policy turned against himself. McCullon orders him from the house and his engagement to Ramona broken.

Ruined and hopeless, Burton returns to his office and decides to venture his last $500 in an effort to recoup his losses. He does so, and fickle fate turns a smile on him. His fortunes rise, and ere many months John Burton is a power on Wall Street.

Ramona's love is still steadfast and she seeks reconciliation, but the gold lust in Burton's heart kills all other love.

As fate turns Burton's balance high, McCullon's goes lower, until by the end of the year he is powerless and Burton ruins him completely in the open market.

Crushed by age and misfortune, McCullon is now the suppliant to Burton and is met with the same cutting words which he formerly had addressed to Burton. Home and money lost, Ramona bravely tries to help her father and earns a meagre pay as a stenographer. Late one day in returning from lunch, she is first upbraided and then insulted by her employer. Resenting the latter, she is dismissed and returns to her humble room broken-hearted.

Old McCullon makes a final appeal to the brokers for credit, and being denied he invests his last few dollars for a gun. Ramona, hearing of her father's death after a sleepless night, is crushed with sorrow.

A few weeks later she meets Burton on the street. He, touched by the tragedy, offers her his hand. She scorns him and refuses the money his secretary takes to her. She writes Burton a note and dispatches it by the secretary.

Burton, in his magnificent dining room, receives the note and reads: "I could never accept money gained by crushing human hearts. I trust the lonely after years will bring your light." As he reads the note he takes the ring she had returned to him, and his mind's-eye sees himself a lonely old man, seated at a lonely table, and his head sinks with sorrow on his breast.

Uncle Tom is working in his yard as Shelby and the lawyer enter. Shelby is compelled to sell Tom and Eliza's child. Eliza, who has overheard the conversation, determines to take her child and escape. She begs Tom to go with her, but he refuses, telling her he always will be faithful.

Next day Eliza's escape is known, and Haley, who has bought her, gets a posse of men and starts to hunt for her. Harris offers a reward for George.

George Harris, disguised as a Spaniard, escapes to Ohio, and is recognized by Phineas Fletcher in a bar. He promises to keep his secret. Meanwhile, Eliza is being hunted by men and dogs.

George has told Phineas of his wife and child, and he promises to go to her rescue. Reaching a tavern near the river, he sees Eliza running, and hides her in a room while her pursuers are drinking. She gets away with the help of Phineas and joins her husband.

Meanwhile Uncle Tom is sold and placed on board a steamer, where he meets Eva, who falls overboard, and Tom jumps in and saves her. He is thanked by St. Clair, who buys him from Haley.

At the St. Clair home Aunt Ophelia arrives and Topsy plays all kinds of tricks on her. St. Clair gives Topsy to Aunt Ophelia, and Tom to Eva. Later Eva falls sick and is dying. She gives Tom a curl of her hair, and he kneels by her bedside. She dies, and Tom comforts himself with his Bible.

In a saloon Legree argues with another man and is going to shoot him. St. Clair tries to prevent this and is shot himself. Carried to his home, he dies. After his death all the slaves are sold, including Tom, who is bought along with Emmeline and others by Legree.

Legree finds Tom reading his Bible and sneers. Meanwhile, a warrant is issued for the arrest of Legree for the murder of St. Clair. At Legree's plantation Legree pesters Emmeline with his attentions. She rejects him and he has her tied to a post and whipped, to the horror of Uncle Tom, who is told to do the whipping. Tom refuses and is tied up and beaten by Legree himself to such an extent that he is taken away dying.

Legree is arrested for the murder of St. Clair, and as Tom dies he sees a vision of Eva holding out her hands.

EVERYBODY'S WEARING THEM (Aug. 27).—Sally, who loves Willie, is partial to whiskers; and the grocery boy having a sprouting beard, she momentarily transfers her affections to him. Willie, who has seen his new rival embrace Sally, drives him away from the house. He finds the circular which the latter has left, lauding the virtues of a hair producer and determines to buy some of the nostrum, more especially since Sally tells him that the man she marries must have a beard.

Willie finds the demonstrator of the fluid and takes his turn in the line of young men who are anxious to grow beards. The mothers of the youths angrily drag their respective offspring away. Willie, however, has succeeded in purchasing a bottle of hair grower and conceals it under his coat as his mother leads him away, and succeeds in surreptitiously apolying some of the fluid before reaching home. Willie is sent to work at the woodpile, and Sally teases him about his lack of hirsute charms.

Left alone, Willie uses more of the liquid, and just then his mother again appears for wood. He hides the bottle in a hollow log. The mother gathers the log, along with several others, and carries it into the house. Willie follows her in suspense, and as she is about to put the log containing the bottle into the stove, he pretends to have a toothache. He goes to the cupboard and, taking the label from the bottle of liniment there, secures the hair grower during his mother's absence and substitutes the liniment label for the tonic label, secreting the hair grower bottle in the cupboard. Willie's mother returns, and getting the supposed "liniment" bottle from the cupboard, she vigorously applies same to Willie's face and bandages up his jaw.

He resists his mother's attempts to remove the bandage later, fearing the whiskers may have appeared. He secures a hand mirror, and going out to the woodpile, takes a look at his face and sees the whiskers sprouting. Sally, on her way to join the grocery boy in a buggy ride, refuses to notice Willie. As she is about to start off, Willie undoes the bandage about his face, disclosing a full beard. Sally sees this, and jumping from the buggy, embraces Willie, leaving the grocery boy to drive away alone.

Sally and Willie enter the yard, when the mother, not recognizing her son, tries to drive him away. Finally she sees who it is and scolds him. She discovers the supposed bottle of hair grower and throws it from the window. A number of children find it and proceed to rub it on their faces. Sally comes on and takes the bottle from the children. She is about to enter the house, when she sees her mother desecrating Willie's pet whiskers with a pair of scissors.

Entering the house, the mother complains of toothache and takes the supposed bottle of liniment from the cupboard and rubs it on her face. Soon the whiskers sprout on her face. She looks in the glass and is horror-struck at the sight of a beard appearing. She throws the bottle out of the window.

In the meantime, the demonstrator, Mlle. Spinach, has ceased selling hair restorer and now sells hair remover. The parents of the children eagerly purchase the latter and Sally also secures a bottle to remove her mother's whiskers. She returns to the house to find that Willie's whiskers have again grown, and together they go to the mother and promise to give her the hair remover if she will allow them to marry. The mother consents and all is well.

WHAT GIRLS WILL DO (Aug. 25).—Stopping at a fashionable hotel at the seashore are a number of beautiful girls all quite well-to-do. They have exhausted their fund of pleasure-seeking and are just longing for some man to turn up, each vowing to herself to capture him. At last the man arrives in the person of Harry Morgan, a wealthy young man who is an habitual flirt and who sought this particular hotel when he learned of conditions there. The girls make desperate love to him and he flirts outrageously with them all. But at every turn he is circumvented from making any real headway with one alone—for the other girls always appear upon the scene. On the beach, sailing, rowing, in the gardens, on the tennis-courts, he is always surrounded by this bevy of youth and beauty, and every serious moment is changed as if by magic into a most laughable and ridiculous one. The landlady has a charming daughter, demure, shy and sweet, utterly unlike the society girls—and Harry, instead of flirting, falls head over heels in love with her. He outwits the girls and asks Mary to be his wife. They are married, and the girls, angry and disappointed over their failure to capture him, write a letter purporting to come from Harry's wife in New York. Mary reads the letter, thinks she has been deceived, and, heartbroken, gives way to uncontrollable grief. The girls, frightened, confess to the writing of the letter, beg forgiveness, which is granted, and go to their rooms sadder but wiser.

The situation clears up. One can but surmise that Harry would do no more flirting and Mary is bound to be happy with the man of her choice.

HIS VACATION (Aug. 29).—Howard, a wealthy business man, has a number of clerks, among them Jim, and as it is vacation time all are thinking of how they will spend their holidays. Howard's daughter, Gertrude, comes to see him and excites Jim's admiration, to which she pays no attention, being a supercilious young woman. At the noon hour, when the other clerks have gone to luncheon, Jim falls asleep.

In his dream Jim finds himself at a beautiful spot in the country. Gertrude and Howard come in an automobile, are very friendly, and they all go to an inn. Afterwards Jim takes Gertrude for a walk, Howard approving. They climb a rock to get a better view, and Gertrude slips and injures her ankle. Jim goes to the inn for help. Some Italians who are lurking in the neighborhood, see Gertrude and join her, and the idea of abducting her occurs to their wicked minds.

Returning with help, Jim meets a girl and a farmer who have seen Gertrude with the Italians, and hastens to rescue her. The Italians become aware of the pursuit. They bind Gertrude and place her in a boat in a stream. They also light a bomb, but in their hurry to escape, inadvertently put it in the boat with Gertrude. Jim finds Gertrude afloat in the boat and in deadly peril.

Jim drives from a bridge and swims after the boat, which he reaches in time to hurl the death-dealing bomb into the water and to rescue Gertrude. For this he receives the heartfelt gratitude of Howard and, needless to say, Jim's union with Gertrude is assured, and then—the clerks return from luncheon and awaken him.

At this happy moment, Howard sends his secretary with a notice that, owing to the pressure of business, no vacations will be allowed to the clerks. And Jim thinks sadly that only in the illusion of sleep he has had His Vacation.

THE MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW ASTER MINE (Aug. 26).—Reed and Rosson are owners of the Yellow Aster mine. They have taken out enough gold to make the final payment, which is due. Both brothers love the same girl, Pauline, but she prefers Reed.

Reed saves an Indian, Eagle Eye, from the drunken taunts of a half-breed, and the latter swears vengeance. The half-breed knows that the gold is ready for the final payment and decides to steal it. With the aid of his pal, a rustler, he kills the watchman and escapes with the gold. Then he kills Eagle Eye and puts the gold sacks near him. The Indians, thinking the white men have murdered their brother, plan an attack on the mine. Pauline's faithful Indian girl-servant learns of the proposed attack and warns the miner. The attack is made and Rosson rides for help. He returns with the cavalry as the miners are making their last stand, and, after a hot fight, the Indians are driven away.

The half-breed and his pal in the meantime have camped in the desert. When the half-breed is asleep his pal steals the gold and rides away. He is bitten by a rattlesnake and decides to risk discovery as a thief and rides to town for aid. A miner meets him and the rustler, now delirious from the poison, confesses the murder of the watchman and the theft of the gold. The miner is honest and, after the rustler dies of the bite, carries the gold back to the mine just in time for the final payment to be made.

THE RED HEART Aug. 31).—Judge Larned, having tried Michael Filippi, a member of the Red Heart Society, a desperate band of murderers, is threatened by the Society with death unless he liberates the prisoner. The judge ignores the letter. Meanwhile the son, Frank, goes out for an auto ride. A girl, a member of the band, sees him. The auto breaks down and she informs her confederates of the presence of the judge's son near their rendezvous. They pounce upon him and make him prisoner. They compel him to write a letter telling his father that unless the judge brings about the release of Filippi they will kill him. One of their band is sent with the letter. He calls and finds only the judge's daughter at home. He gives her the note. She goes out, gets a revolver and imprisons him in a clothes closet. Meanwhile the gang, anxious because of his absence, send one of their women to the judge's home. Miss Larned gives her a note saying that she will keep the Italian prisoner as long as they hold her brother. Upon receipt of this note they release Frank and he leaves the place, but drops playing cards as he walks along as a means of identifying the rendezvous of the gang. On the way he telephones to his father's office to bring a squad of police, and later finds the meeting-place through the medium of the playing cards, which is descended upon and all of the gang are made prisoners. Meanwhile the Italian imprisoned in the closet has succeeded in breaking the lock and overpowering Miss Larned, whom he is trying to choke when the judge and his son enter just in time to save her life and have the brigand arrested.

MAYA—JUST AN INDIAN (Aug. 30).—Her teachers at Carlisle had great hopes for Maya. They thought she might carry the message of civilization to her tribe because she became so thoroughly Americanized. But it was not many months after she returned to them before she had gone back to the blanket, as the saying is, living the life of her ancestors. Yellow Horse, her Indian suitor, was glad to see this. He thought it meant he stood a better chance of winning her, but she had learned too much of the white man's ways to ever be truly happy as an Indian.

Bill West, returning empty-handed from a prospecting trip, heard from the old trader that True Eagle, Maya's father, knew where there was gold. He attempted to learn the secret of his tribe from the aged chieftain, but failed. In Maya, however, yearning to be wooed as the white man wooed, he found an easy tool. Telling her he loved her, he induced her to learn the secret, which she obtained from her father only upon a pledge never to see Bill again. But evening found her with him and True Eagle grew nervous when he found she was absent from the village. He went in search of them and found Maya and Bill at the site of the gold. Cut to the quick by her duplicity, he expelled her from the tribe and would have driven Bill away from the place but that the prospector told him Maya was his wife.

Unmolested by the Indians, Bill panned his gold. Daily the hoard grew and daily grew his yearning for his own kind. Finally he made preparations to leave, and Maya, resigned now to his brutality and loving him in spite of it, opposed his plans as soon as she discovered it. She hid his gold, fearing he would not heed her plaint, and he went. But first he treated her far more cruelly than he had done before. Maya was bereft of even such poor love as he had shown her. Her heart died within her. Then came her aged father to her place and found her ill. Back to his own tent he took her, and there she slowly grew stronger.

Two years passed and True Eagle learned from the trader that Bill was near at hand in a little settlement on the railroad. Imparting the news to Yellow Horse he planned revenge for Bill's treachery, but Maya was before him. She had overheard the tale and hate grew within her. She thought she saw a way to win Bill back, to wrest from him the wife he had taken from the white people, and to live again with the man she felt to be hers.

She got the gold from its hiding-place and went to the little settlement. An hour's wait at the post-office brought Bill in search of the letter and money he had asked the trader to lend him. Maya followed him home. Soon he left to call a doctor, for his wife was very ill with consumption. This, indeed, was the cause of his return to the mountain country. Into the house went Maya, and there she found the woman. She thought she was sleeping, but soon discovered that her stillness was that of illness. There, too, was the baby that had been born to them. Maya's heart, warmed by hate, grew cold again. She laid the gold down, renouncing with it all hope of winning back her man again, laid upon it the knife she had brought for his wife and went away.

Bill returned to his home, found the gold and the knife and understood. It was the other side of the page he had read two years before, when he opened the gold bag and found worthless rocks and sand. Now he again had the precious metal he had digged from the Indian stream, the value he had filched from their secret hiding-place.

And Maya—he didn't bother about her. She was "just an Injun," anyway.

A WOMAN'S STRATAGEM (Aug. 28).—Margarita Radcliff loves Bob Asquith, her father's confidential secretary and right hand man.

Radcliff & Company, brokers, have battled for control of the L. M. & O. with Schwartz, another broker, for years, and although Schwartz has resorted to underhand means, he has so far been worsted.

Schwartz in the Stock Exchange makes overtures to Bob to buy inside information of the Radcliff plans and Bob slaps his face for a reply.

Frank Harvey, old Radcliff's partner, through speculation loses his private fortune completely. Schwartz, knowing this, bribes him to tip him on the Radcliff inside policy. Harvey, to recoup his private losses, agrees to this and the next day he tells Schwartz the details of the Radcliff closed meeting, at which only directors and Bob were present. Schwartz takes advantage of this information and taunts Radcliff in the Exchange, falsely laying the blame on Bob. Radcliff, in a fury, hastens to his office and discharges Bob without a hearing. Harvey tells this to Schwartz, who is duly pleased at the success of his plan.

Bob hastens to Margarita with the news of his dismissal, and she vainly entreats her father to investigate and reinstate Bob. The old man refuses and Bob is ignored as a traitor in the Exchange.

Schwartz & Company advertise for a new stenographer a few days later, and Margarita determines to apply for the position and learn, if possible, who the real traitor is. She gets the position, being unknown to Schwartz, and at the next closed meeting of the Radcliff Company she learns that their decision is to reach Schwartz as the meeting closes. She watches anxiously at the given time and sees the decision "Sell L. M. & O." flashed by means of a mirror, from the Radcliffe office to the Schwartz office wall.

Hurrying out as soon as she can get away, she telegraphs Bob to meet her at her father's office next morning.

The next morning Margarita and Bob appear, denounce Harvey as the traitor and Bob is welcomed back. Harvey sneaks, like a whipped cur, to Schwartz.

Meanwhile, Bob turns the market and Schwartz's plans are frustrated and himself ruined. His revenge falls on his tool, Harvey, and he chokes him into insensibility. Bob, with the battle fever in his veins, buys the controlling interest in L. M. & O. amid the strife of the Pit.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY (Aug. 16).—There is much genuine amusement incorporated in this comedy, and at the same time it teaches a lesson calculated to drive away suspicion from the minds of doubting matrons. Mr. Smith is a sedate lawyer, and at the urging of three of his friends, goes out on a little bathing expedition and Smith fails to notify his wife. She is suspicious of him and engages the services of a woman detective to trail him and report his movements. Smith and his pals are having the time of their lives and in the meantime the detective in petticoats is on his trail. The latter has been furnished with an accurate description of his wearing apparel, and this fact leads to many strange and amusing adventures. While Smith is enjoying a dip in the ocean, a seedy and hard up individual enters the dressing room and appropriates the raiment of the young lawyer. Incidentally there is a considerable sum of money in the coat, and this proves a great temptation to the intruder. He rushes to his best girl clad in his new raiment and invites her out to a swell cafe, where he proceeds to spend the money that he has found in Smith's pocketbook. All the while the female detective is on the trail of the man who is wearing the latter's clothes, and she becomes convinced that he is Smith. When the interloper is sufficiently intoxicated the lady detective piles him into a taxi and carries him to Smith's home. Smith, in the meantime, has borrowed new clothes, and when he arrives at his domicile he is surprised to find there a stranger clad in the suit that had been stolen from the bathing pavilion. There is an exciting scene between husband and wife and the former leads the intruder to the garden gate, where he forgives him for having appropriated his clothing and returns to the family home to hear his wife vow that never again will she become suspicious of her husband's fidelity.

ZION CITY CEREMONY FILMED

The impressive ceremony and ritual which signalized the official appointment of the Apostles by Overseer Voliva at Zion City recently were made a matter of enduring historical record by moving pictures.

The solemn processional, the interior of the wonderful Zion Tabernacle, views of the great choir slowly marching down the aisles and taking their places on the platform where the Rev. Voliva presides, were all filmed and show up with amazing realism.

These pictures were made by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago by special order of the Zion Church, and were officially accepted and endorsed by Overseer Voliva and his elders at the exhibition which was held privately at Chicago, July 29th.

Overseer Voliva made the statement to Watterson R. Rothacker, general manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Company, that the recent ordinance passed by the City Council of Zion City was not aimed at the moving pictures as a means of illustration but at the objectionable film stories too generally released.

The moving pictures taken at Zion City under Overseer Voliva's direction will be exhibited all over the world under the auspices of the Zion Church. The negative will be sealed, put in a vault and kept as an invaluable record in the Zion archives prepared for posterity.

ITALA NOTES

A record sale attesting to the drawing power of the feature film is the action of Sam Benjamin, of Chicago, in purchasing the state rights of Iowa on a second copy of "Tigris." This is probably the first time in the history of state rights that two copies of such a long subject as "Tigris" have ever been sold for that state alone. "The Death Knell," the Itala three-reel subject is being actively booked by the Golden Gate Film Exchange of San Francisco and the Emby Feature Film Company of New York City, W. E. Greene of Boston and the Attractive Feature Film Company of Philadelphia. The Weiland Feature Film Company, of Pittsburgh, bought the Itala two-reeler, "Branded for Life," as has also the M. & F. Feature Film Company of Chicago.

PICTURE MUSIC

Ernst Luz

AT the present time the greatest drawback to the best possible results in picture music may be found in the very indifferent method of projection. Regardless of how well you have selected your program, or how appropriately it may musically portray the sentiment of the picture, still when the picture is carelessly projected there can hardly be any noticeable results, while, on the other hand, there are many situations during which really appropriate music is little more than a joke. Possibly the most noticeable of these is the chase. The orchestra or pianist is playing a lively galop and the operator is running the picture at a twenty-three minute gait, and many times not that fast, the horses' hoofs sometimes pausing in mid-air. Can you imagine how exciting such a combination can really be, yet the operator who sees so many pictures and should know better looks on tranquilly from his peep-hole in the booth, well satisfied if his fire shutter does not cut off more than half of the picture on the screen. It is very peculiar that while the music in a picture theatre does get a fair share of criticism, the operator, and many times the exhibitor, gives little or no attention to bringing out the detail of the picture action on the screen. It seems to be sufficiently difficult to get a good light. With the new and improved machines this should no longer be a difficult matter, and some attention should be given to the obtaining of more accurate action results on the screen. While the motor solves the problem of uniform projection, it still remains a fact that better picture results can be obtained by hand when the operator is interested.

ERNST LUZ

The ultimate success of music and the picture depends very much upon the projecting of a picture, giving the action its natural interpretation. After all is said, the operator and the music constitute the picture show, and pains should be taken to bring out every detail in as artistic a manner as possible. The standard placed upon an operator should be his ability in giving good action portrayal on the screen, his light should be a natural consequence, for if he has good machinery, and keeps it in order, he must obtain light results, and where he is without these he does not get the results however clever he may be, for obtaining light on a screen is certainly no gift of the Supreme Being. In my endeavors for getting such results I had only one thought, the creating of certain screen conditions simplifying the musical possibilities.

It is true that the lone pianist juggles with all those conditions and does get away with them at the expense of his musical program, no one being overly interested, but conditions are different when an orchestra is installed. The expense is greater and proportionately greater recults are expected. When picture music is attempted with orchestra, careless projection is a great drawback and the exhibitor who realizes this will find a new inducement in the picture theatre. The improvement in the manufacture of film has been very marked in the past year, and it is very seldom that one sees a disconnected story produced. In some instances better acting and more detailed development of plot is all that can be hoped for. It becomes the duty of the musician in his individual theatre to induce the exhibitor to try to obtain good picture action results as well as uniform projection, which will simplify his efforts and make the music in picture theatres a financial as well as artistic success.

In playing the pictures it will be found very effective to open a picture in a style of what is often termed a curtain raiser. To obtain the proper effect it is essential that you open with the first announcement on the film and play something foreign to the first temperamental number you intend using. Such a number should never be long and in most cases heavy. Short introductions to waltzes and other numbers are many times very good, and the opening or first descriptive or introductory action is covered by one number. Where you find waltz introductions very long you will usually find more than one tempo, as is common in the Strauss waltzes. By beginning at the last tempo before the waltz you will have a curtain raiser as well as your first neutral number when a waltz is desired. The same condition exists in many numbers of other temperaments. When I say that these openings should be heavy, I mean that they should stand out and allow for fortissimo effect. When used for an introduction to a sentimental or pathetic opening the chords should be full and allow for maestoso tempo. It is understood that in the closing of a picture you get your entire result or ruin it.

At this point you will find indifferent projection to be your greatest handicap. You can nevertheless protect yourself somewhat by selecting either short numbers or such numbers as do not modulate from their tonic triads for any length of time. If the number you intend to close the picture with is written in the key of C, be sure that each strain ends in C and does not modulate into other keys or preparatory chords for the following strain. You will find this very simple and you will have no difficulty in locating any quantity of numbers wherewith the closing of a picture is made simple.

The two machines in many theatres make the closing of a picture very difficult, and great care must be taken in the selection of numbers in these houses. The operator makes it doubly difficult when he threads up most of the leader of the succeeding film. Another case of "Mr. Operator, please have a heart."

* * * *

I have many requests for plots of films released, but time and space do not allow for the setting of them. Some time ago I decided that it was of no benefit to the average picture player, it being necessary that he make a temperamental study of the picture to be able to program a plot, whereupon I wrote articles on the musical temperamental value of picture action. While plots will be the only means whereby a picture can be successfully followed by music, it is necessary that a library of music be classified and standardizing before good programming results can be obtained without seeing the picture. The standard necessary can only be brought to a successful issue by the manufacturers. The co-operation of the manufacturer is to be hoped for in picture music. At the present time he seems to have little confidence in the average ability of the picture musician. You can readily see that he knows of the brutal handling many of his films receive and he is reluctant in taking any of the blame. Let us all try to inject an ordinary amount of intelligence into the work, thereby getting a few results, after which I have no doubt he will do his share. I have found none unwilling to do that which promised to show any results at all.

OUR MOTTO—ONE FOR ALL, ALL FOR ONE

The special meeting called for last Monday, August 11, 1913, by the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, brought out an immense turnout of members. An attendance of over 350 members tested the seating capacity of the meeting room, and also demonstrated the interest of the members in organization matters. Special business was transacted which was of vital importance to all members, and a special committee of nineteen members, including the executive board, were in extra session to discuss a situation now existing in this city. The question in hand was thoroughly debated and thrashed and the report of the committee was concurred in by the entire body. Just at present the writer is restricted not to give details or particulars on some matters, but should things not shape themselves satisfactorily to all concerned, the readers of the Chat may look forward to some mighty fine news. But we trust matters will right themselves in a short time.

NOTICE

The next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will be on Monday, August 18, 1913, at 12 p.m. at the meeting rooms, Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex Street.

J. A. LeROY,
Bus. Representative.

Quite a little storm of protest was aroused by the actinn of the powers-that-be in forbidding the presentation of "Ludwig II," at the Berliner Theatre. In this play, the dual role of the unhappy king and the great Bismarck was to have been sustained by one of the best German actors, Ferdinand Bonn. However, German audiences shall have an opportunity of witnessing the play on the cinematograph.

Encouraged by the tremendous success that they have experienced with their film of Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson and company in "Hamlet," Messrs. Gaumont have now embarked upon another important venture. This is no less than the filming of Mr. Martin Harvey and his company in the famous play, "The Cigarette Maker's Romance."

Bringing with them thousands of feet of some of the most interesting pictures of sea life as it exists off the coast of Lower California, a score of officials and employees of the Ocean-to-Ocean Motion Picture Company have returned to the company's headquarters in Los Angeles. The pictures are being developed and will be exhibited in all parts of the world. The pictures are of sea elephants and were taken off the coast of Guadalupe Island.

The very latest distinguished potentate to become acquainted with the beauties of Kinemacolor is Mulai Abdul Aziz, ex-Sultan of Morocco, who, accompanied by Kaid Sir H. Maclean, K.C.M.G., has just spent an afternoon at Mr. Charles Urban's studios in Wardour street. Naturally the late monarch of Islam was completely captivated by the magic of natural color kinematography. He made almost endless inquiries concerning the various stages of the process, and eventually ordered for his residence in Algiers a full installation of Kinemacolor, including a large library of notable films and a camera which he feels quite competent to operate.

THE COLONIAL FILM COMPANY REORGANIZED

The Colonial Film Company, of Washington, D. C., was recently reorganized, following the sale of the interests of H. A. Dowling, one of the principal stockholders, to A. C. Marks and J. Gordon Lathrop. Mr. Marks, a newspaper man, and Mr. Lathrop, who held a secretarial position in Congress, are giving all their time and energy to the company, while Sig. G. Boernstein, Nelson M. McKernan and Jack Mullein form a hustling staff of experts in the technical side of the work. The scope of their activities has been broadened to include nearly every sort of work in the moving picture line. A specialty is being made just now of pictures for the deaf and dumb, the company being official motion picture photographers for the National Association for the Education of the Deaf.

CENSOR'S OFFICE OF VANCOUVER, B. C., BUYS SIMPLEX MACHINE

Office of Censor of Moving Pictures,
Vancouver, B. C., July 23rd, 1913.

C. T. Holdsworth, Esq.,
Manager Mutual Film Company, City.

Dear Sir: This is to inform you that I accept your offer of July 9th, 1913, to supply to the government of British Columbia, for use in my office, one Simplex moving picture projection machine, same to be equipped with motor drive for 110 volts, alternating current (motor drive to be of type carrying underwriters' approval in Canada), projector to be equipped with special large magazines to carry two thousand-foot reels and to carry chain drive on the take-up.

Yours truly,
C. L. GORDON, Censor of Moving Pictures.

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA

Feature films were given a trial at the Academy of Music during the last three weeks for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it would be a wise move to keep the theatre open during the summer rather than "dark," as has been the custom since it was first built. Kleinschmidt and Lane's Alaska-Siberia pictures in six reels failed to draw and the three-reel "Quo Vadis" was shown together with "The Odyssey" in six reels, the combination of nine reels for ten cents failing to attract a crowd at any show during the three days the pictures were on. Manager Kessnich has booked quite a number of small towns in West Virginia and is putting on "Quo Vadis" under the direction of Jake Wells.

The legitimate motion picture houses are drawing well every day and the management of each house is taking especial pains to offer the best programs available. The Trenton and Belvedere, the two licensed houses, and the Gayety and Majestic, independent places, are all favorites, and big crowds are to be seen at each theatre daily and nightly.

At the Belvedere Theatre this week a song written by T. D. Berry, Jr., who is well known in Lynchburg, and has just had the music published, was sung by Milton Perkins, a local tenor, and the new piece went big. "Your Eyes" is the title, and it is claimed that it is destined to be the most popular hit since "The Rosary."—Trevelyan Baber.

UNIVERSAL BUYS BUFFALO BILL'S ANIMALS

Through the sale by court order of the effects of the Two Bills Show at Denver, Thursday, July 31, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company came into possession of a big addition to its West Coast Zoo. Two camels and seven elephants are among the beasts acquired. They will be sent immediately to Universal City, near Los Angeles, where they will be employed in the making of a new Biblical picture, which General Manager Isidor Bernstein has in contemplation.

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE CORPORATION

The third monthly dividend of one per cent. upon the capital stock of the New York Motion Picture Corporation has been declared payable on August 15th, 1913, to stockholders of record August 11th, 1913.

New York, August 7th, 1913. CHARLES J. HITE.
Treasurer.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

President M. A. Neff Makes a Statement in Which He Defends His Actions and Defines His Policies

In a letter to the Moving Picture News, President Neff makes a plain statement of facts regarding the organization, the handling of money and other matters of interest to the League, and requests that full publicity be given to the same. We reprint the letter in full:

To the Motion Picture Exhibitors:

I believe it my duty to make a plain statement of facts, and while I reluctantly do so, I want it thoroughly understood that I will not be drawn into any newspaper arguments or personal controversies. My policy in the future will be the same as in the past—to organize the bona fide motion picture exhibitors into a concrete league; to solidify and harmonize all interests pertaining to our business.

At the inception of the league, it was apparent to me that it would require patience, time and money to organize the exhibitors, and after due deliberation, I decided to undertake the gigantic task, fully realizing the obstacles to overcome. To undertake the organization of several thousand disorganized business men, I appreciate that I would have to sacrifice not only money and time, but several years of my life. I assumed the responsibility, and whether the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is a success or not, I leave to those who understand what has been accomplished to judge.

At no time since the League was organized has there been placed at my disposal a fund of one dollar to be drawn upon. I have financed, and have advanced money to the League from the time of its inception, and have waited until the League could refund the money. I have never had at any time as much as $100 that belonged to the League in my possession. Moneys from all sources are paid to the secretary, which he turns over to the treasurer, after making a record of the amount.

When visiting the various states, the dues of a few of the states or the money for a charter was paid to me, and this is all of the money that I have ever collected, with the exception of small amounts for traveling expenses, and all the money received for traveling expenses was credited to the League, and the other sent to the secretary. The books of the secretary and treasurer will show every dollar collected and disbursed, and I refer anyone to C. M. Christianson, former secretary; Geo. H. Wiley, secretary, World Theatre, Eighth and Highland avenue, Kansas City, Mo.; or J. J. Rieder, treasurer, Jackson, Mich.

The entire amount I have received for salary, office expenses, traveling expenses, incidentals, supplies for the League, etc., from the first day of August, 1912, to the first day of June, 1913, ten months, amounted to $2,794.17. I traveled thousands of miles, kept one stenographer all the time, and part of the time two, paid printers' bills for the making of the charters, and a number of other bills, and the total amount for salary and all of these expenses amounts to $2,794.17.

The books of the League are open to any member to verify every statement made. There is not now, and never was, a dollar placed in any bank or fund by the League that I might draw upon for the running expenses of the League, and I never received a dollar from the League except by check, which had to be authorized by the secretary and endorsed by the treasurer.

At the New York convention, an auditing committee was appointed, and on Friday morning they asked for more time, and Mr. Wiley, chairman of the committee, announced to the convention that the books were open to anyone's investigation, or who wish to look them over. The convention voted on Wednesday, July 9th, to nominate officers on Thursday afternoon, and make it a special order of business to elect officers Friday morning, July 11th. As the election of officers had been made a special business for Friday morning, I ruled the first thing in order after the calling of the roll (as it was almost eleven o'clock before the roll was complete) that the convention would proceed to elect officers.

A New York delegate appealed from the decision of the chair. A vote was taken and the chair was sustained. WYhen the State of Texas was reached it was apparent to everybody that I would be elected by at least two to one, and it was well known that every state from Texas on was solid for me.

During all of the discord, I gave the bolting states the preference in trying to conciliate them, but their action shows it was impossible to conciliate or have harmony so long as they remained in the convention. I positively did not attend a caucus, did not ask a delegate to support me, and while I knew all that was transpiring, and was familiar with the things that were said on the trains, in the lobbies and other places, I tried in every way to avoid strife, and to maintain harmony and peace. When the convention was opened and I asked a delegate from Chicago to please be seated so the roll could be called, he refused to take his seat, and the sergeant-at-arms was called upon to seat him. There seemed to be a concerted action and understanding that the bolters should rule or withdraw. Several delegates were forced to leave for home before a vote was taken for the election of officers.

In conclusion, I desire to say to the motion picture exhibitors throughout the country that I am working night and day to bring about a condition beneficial to every exhibitor, and to establish our line of business on a firm, substantial basis, whereby each and every exhibitor, large and small, may receive a square deal, and that we may eliminate the possibility of unjust discrimination that has existed heretofore; and to this end I am and will continue to fight until justice and commercial freedom are established, and every motion picture exhibitor enjoys his inrent right of freedom.

M. A. NEFF,
President of Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America.

Just for the sake of accuracy in detail and to lend the exact shade of correctness to such productions, the Cines Company of Rome has brought seventy actors and actresses to Rome from Madrid, Spain, including two well-known stage directors. These pictures will all be multiple-reel subjects and are being produced under the personal direction of E. Guazzone, the director of "Quo Vadis."

The library of educational and scientific films at Berlin, Germany, will be in full working order early in October. Special lectures to accompany the subjects are now in course of preparation, and the cinematograph trade is anxious for the result of this experiment in education by means of the moving picture.

THE EXCLUSIVE SUPPLY CORPORATION

How It Differs from Other Supply Organizations and Why the Feature Program Has Caused An Evolution in the Film Game

The Exclusive Supply Corporation, with New York headquarters in the Candler Building, West Forty-second street, have recently issued an announcement about what they term their "actual exclusive feature program." It is claimed in this announcement that when features first made their appearance in this country, the Itala, the Great Northern, the Gaumont and Solax companies opened a new field for motion picture exploitation.

Asked by a News representative for further particulars in regard to the opening of the new field referred to, John B. Clymer, the advertising manager of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, held forth as follows:

"The Itala, Great Northern, Gaumont and Solax were pioneers in this new field. They supplied features that were not only exceptional and different from the ordinary American-made film, but their large and varied line of advertising matter gave opportunity for special effort and naturally drew marked attention from the public.

"Formerly it was possible for the individual buyer of territory to operate with a single feature, carried under his arm. No office was required. Then a host of imitators sprung up on every side. The regular program combination attempted to make features and began to offer these on 'regular service' without extra charge, in an effort to exterminate the real feature.

"The product of the 'pioneers' has constantly improved, and the demand has increased. Gaumont, Itala, Great Northern and Solax features are selling to-day at higher prices than ever before, which is the best indication of conditions. These companies sell throughout the world, and can easily afford to expend double the sum usually devoted to the so-called American feature, which reaches a limited number of buyers.

"To-day the 'feature man' with his 'show under his arm' has almost entirely disappeared. Instead, we find 'feature' offices in abundance, many of which supply a complete weekly service of features, while others buy one or more subjects intermittently and supply the larger theatres."

"What was the origin of the 'Exclusive'?"

"Why the Exclusive may be said to have been organized under peculiar circumstances. Herbert Blache decided about four or five months ago to resign from the presidency of the Gaumont Company to devote more of his time to Solax productions. Meanwhile, exhibitors were getting more and more dissatisfied with the quality of films that were being put on the market.

"This condition of affairs was talked over at a meeting that was held at the house of Mr. Blache. That meeting was attended by Mr. Blache, Harry Raver, I. C. Oes, and Joseph R. Miles. Mr. Raver, as you know, is secretary and treasurer of the Itala Company, and at that time was general manager of the Film Supply Company of America, of which Mr. Blache was president; Mr. Oes, vice-president, and Mr. Miles, treasurer. Mr. Oes is well known as the efficient president of the Great Northern Company. In the course of the meeting it was resolved to reorganize the Film Company of America under the title of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, which was duly organized about three months ago. Messrs. Blache, Raver and Oes have always been opposed to the forced program—that is, they are opposed to the policy of combinations owning factories forcing upon the exhibitor a majority of mediocre films. This condition made it possible for the Exclusive brands to thrive, as they all possessed merit and are to-day being distributed on a quality basis at higher prices than the combinations are able to secure. The Exclusive was created to supply features to better theatres. Its officers are: Herbert Blache, president; I. C. Oes, vice-president; Harry R. Raver, secretary and treasurer; and Joseph R. Miles, general manager."

"In what respect does the Exclusive differ from other film supply concerns in what you announce as its actual exclusive program?"

"The 'Exclusive' plan differs greatly from any other form of 'program' in America. All films are protected by copyright, and buyers are granted liberal territory exclusively. Releases are so regulated that manufacturers are called on for only a minimum number of productions. This assures high quality which is most desired. Buyers of territory may arrange for a complete weekly supply of features or the addition of single and split reels if wanted. Territory will be sold for one or more features, although preference will be given to buyers who contract for a weekly supply for an extended period. Wholesale rates are granted on yearly full-program contracts.

"Being firmly determined to make the Exclusive Supply Corporation the strongest clearing house for big films in all the world, no effort or expense was spared to secure the selling agency for the All-Star big plays with noted players. 'The Exclusive' completed final arrangements with the All-Star and is authorized to supply its list of popular American successes. These are now in preparation under the personal direction of Mr. Augustus Thomas, whose name alone assures the high quality of All-Star plays. The first All-Star production, as you know, will be 'Arizona.'"

INGVALD C. OES
Vice-President Exclusive Supply Corporation

"What other feature films does the Exclusive control?"

"The Exclusive controls the distribution of the oldest and best feature producers in Europe and America. Among these are the Gaumont Company, the Great Northern Film Company, the Itala Features, the Solax Company, the Ammex Company, the Danmark Features, the Ryno Film Company, and the Dragon Films. Since the Exclusive was organized we have added Louis Pennant Features, selections from the various brands made in Europe. We have also arranged to handle the output of the Film Releases of America, selected weekly from fourteen different brands, the productions of which are controlled by Richard Edmondson, who sailed for Europe the other day. The Eclectic Film Company have contracted with the Exclusive to supply their big feature productions, such as 'Les Miserables' and 'The Mysteries of Paris,' etc.

"The Exclusive is a large and well capitalized exchange, and has no use for pikers. There is no money in selling one man once or once in a while. The Exclusive proposes to open accounts only with those who take their entire feature program."

In a subsequent chat with the News representative Mr. Blache said, "I have always felt that the feature program is the evolution in the film game. To-day is a sort of period of transition, and the one-reel subjects are gradually falling back into the rear, and in their place the big subjects are taking precedence. As soon as regular feature-buying exchanges are established the small piker exchanges and junk exchanges will be put out of business, and the established exchanges that handle single-reel programs will lose considerable revenue.

"The time is ripe for big features. All the exhibitors throughout the country are demanding multiple reels almost daily. You cannot give them enough of it. The Exclusive Supply Corporation has signed up about fifteen contracts for their feature program and means to add several big feature brands to its already strong program so that exhibitors can receive regularly one feature every day. Now, we have a program of twenty-two reels a week—a feature averaging three reels, five times a week together with seven single reels a week. That output is quite sufficient for any well established exchange."

The Photo-Drama Company is the name of an Illinois corporation organized by George Kleine and E. A. Stevani which owns the negative and all rights to the eight-reel Ambrosio spectacle "The Last Days of Pompeii." Mr. George Kleine is offering no American rights for sale. Mr. Stevani, whose address is 55 Rue street, Lazare, Paris, handles the European rights, all of which have been sold.

THE DOOM OF DARKNESS

Four-Reel Drama, Released by the True Feature Company

"The Doom of Darkness" is a tragedy simple enough to appeal to a child and powerful enough to move the heart of a man. Here is the skeleton of the story:

Professor Thomas Lovelace is a famous surgeon, devoted heart and soul to his work and patients. The fame of his sanatorium is world wide. He can cut with sharp steel into the delicate tracery of men's most vital tissues and save health and life. Professor Lovelace is so thoroughly absorbed in his work that he takes no note of the strain it imposes upon him, until he suddenly feels a sharp pain in his eyes. His nephew and assistant at the sanatorium, Earle Lovelace, is alarmed and prevails upon the professor to consult an oculist, a friend and neighbor.

The oculist gives the professor an examination, and it may be well to say here that the thorough and scientific examination is portrayed upon the screen with absolute fidelity to life. As a result of the examination the oculist forbids the professor to perform any further operations, and the professor promises to take a rest.

Just as the professor is preparing to leave the office of the oculist, a celebrated actress, Agnes Cameron, is brought to the sanatorium of the professor. She is hastily examined by the professor's assistants, who at once realize that her condition is precarious, and that only prompt action by the professor himself will hold out any chance of salvation. They telephone to the professor at the oculist's office.

The oculist attempts to suppress the message as it comes over the wire, but the professor's quick ear has caught up the cry of distress as it echoes through the instrument, and gets hold of the receiver. He learns of his new patient's dangerous condition and rushes to his sanatorium. A hasty examination confirms the judgment of his assistants that no time is to be lost. He knows that the operation will be a very difficult one, but decides to perform it and saves the life of the young actress.

The punishment of Nature for his sublime disregard of the oculist's advice follows swiftly. The overworked eyes of the professor refuse to do their master's bidding, and he is plunged into the doom of darkness. Strong man that he is, this frightful affliction shakes his soul to its very depths, and he cannot reconcile himself to a life of helplessness which his misfortune forces upon him.

The young artist whose life has been saved at such tremendous cost is on her way to rapid recovery. A friend brings her fruit, flowers, books and newspapers, and as she opens one of the journals she is startled by a headline telling of the doctor's blindness and describing the causes leading up to it. The thought that she owes her life to such heroism gives birth in her soul to the firm resolve that she will make her eyes do the work of the eyes that have saved her life.

As soon as her condition allows, she hurries to Professor Lovelace, and implores him for permission to become his nurse and serve him. The once great but now helpless man gives his consent, and it seems as if the dark road would now be brightened by a woman's pity and gratitude. Indeed, the professor finds his grateful guide so willing and ready for perpetual sacrifice that he tells her that she must not renounce her youth and career from a mistaken sense of gratitude and begs her to leave him. She tells him that her life belongs to him and he, throbbing with affection for his messenger of hope, declares that he would be happy to be united to her forever. Still animated by pity and gratitude, the young woman accepts his offer of marriage and becomes his fiancée.

Love and Fate, however, take a hand when the professor's nephew, Earle Lovelace, returns from his post-graduate course at the university, a full-fledged surgeon and physician. The actress falls in love with him at first sight and he returns her love. They avow their affection for each other in secret, and pledge themselves to sacrifice their own happiness for the sake of the blind professor. Then Earle resolves to go away.

The professor, however, though unable to see, has with the keen hearing of the blind overheard their whispered avowals of love and renunciation, and he decides not to stand in the way of their happiness. He sends a letter to his friend, the oculist, declaring that he has a premonition of death. He tells him in the letter that if any untoward accident befalls him his fortune is to be turned over to the institute for improving the condition of the blind. In conclusion he writes: "And it is my special wish and desire that you inform my nephew, Dr. Earle Lovelace, and my faithful guide, Agnes Cameron, that I will ever remember their kindness to me, and that in life or death they will always have my blessing."

The next day the professor ventures out to his favorite haunt, at the end of a path where there is a dangerous precipice, and now his only guide is his dog.

The day after they find the professor down at the foot of the cliffs, his sightless orbs turned toward heaven, and his heart quite still. The professor no longer stands in the way.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

New methods bring new friends.

* * * *

Our circulation is increasing daily.

* * * *

Every day brings a new opportunity.

* * * *

Each unused opportunity is the equivalent of so much idle or wasted capital.

* * * *

Some men have money, others brains, few both.

* * * *

The public wants a clean moving picture show. We notice the public gets what it wants in the long run.

* * * *

A wise opportunity knows when, where and how to present itself so as to gain acceptance.

* * * *

It seems that even the Governor of the State may be called to account for prostituting an opportunity to serve the people into one for plundering them.

* * * *

Business is not charity, though charity often becomes a business. We are not in business for our health; frankly our object is to make money. We want an "ad" from every producer and a subscription from every exhibitor. What do the producer and exhibitor want?

* * * *

Success is measured by character, not by money or social position. It is more important to know what a man is than to know what he has, excepting, of course, to the few metalized mortals known as the "newly rich."

* * * *

That man is a degenerate—morally rotten—who for mere money shows to his neighbor's children pictures which he would not permit his own to behold. He is many degrees worse than a murderer; there is but one beneath him in the moral scale. Who? Why the maker of the same film, of course.

* * * *

The moral effect of to-day's moving picture show should be of supreme concern to all, from film producer to the man in the rear seat in the audience. Why? Because character is formed in youth; youth rapidly develops into maturity, and the youth have a good right to correct and proper educational pictures. Suppress the unwholesome pictures! Do it now!!

A man's antecedents illustrate and explain his character. Up to elite society, from playing the ponies for a livelihood, by way of sportsmanship and clubdom, upon moving picture profits is quite a trip. And it must form quite an experience. But does it raise the tone of the industry?

MISS TENNANT BACK AT WORK

Barbara Tennant, the popular leading lady of the American-Eclair Company, is back at work in the Fort Lee studio after a pleasant month's vacation at the seashore, most of which was spent driving a 60-hp. auto.

Miss Tennant certainly deserved her rest, since she had been working very hard for the past year in the feature productions of the American-Eclair. The acting of Miss Tennant in such productions as "For the Honor of Lady Beaumont," "Fortune's Pet," "The Superior Law," "The Greater Call," "The Beaten Path," and scores of others have brought her to the front as one of the most popular photoplay stars now appearing on the screen.

The chief charm of her work is the evident sincerity of her histrionic efforts and her wonderfully expressive eyes. On the front cover of this week's issue we present a portrait of Miss Tennant reproduced from one of her latest photographs.

E. O. BROOKS TO LEAVE THE GAUMONT COMPANY

The personnel of the Gaumont Company at Flushing is preparing to shed tears of regret at the departure of their genial publicity manager on August 23d. Mr. E. O. Brooks, who has been connected with Gaumont's for only three months, has quite revolutionized the advertising arrangements of that firm during his brief spell, and the announcements of the firm have been characterized by striking originality. Mr. Brooks informs us that business claims at Montreal compel him to return to that city in order to give personal attention to the booking agency operated by him and run under his name. The E. Oswald Brooks Booking Agency, 442 Birks Building, Montreal, which concern has been entrusted with the handling of such big British stars as Martin Harvey, Lawrence Brough, Quinlan Grand Opera Company (200 members, 75 in orchestra), Matheson Lang & Hutin Britton Company, and a host of other attractions which will tour Canada exclusively and under the Brooks Agency direction. Mr. Brooks further announces his intention of booking "road show tours" for the very biggest of American and British feature films on from five to eight reels, so he will not be altogether lost to the "movies" world, after all.

Mr. Alec Lorrimore is named as Mr. Brooks' successor at the Flushing studios of Messrs. Gaumont.

MARY'S TEMPTATION
Lubin Release

IRENE WALLACE

Who appears as Esther in the historical Imp feature entitled "Jewish Freedom Granted by King Casimir of Poland," to be released shortly by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company

IRENE WALLACE

Irene Wallace, whose portrait is presented on another page, has entered the charmed circle of popular players. She was born in New York and is of Scotch-Irish parentage.

Miss Wallace is a comparatively new addition to the Cinematographic fold, as she only entered the moving picture field a little over a year ago. Previously she appeared for several seasons in musical comedy under Shubert management. Before her engagement in musical comedy she gained some experience in vaudeville as one of May Ward's Dresden Dolls.

There is an old legend according to which the Scotch and Irish are descendents of the Seven Lost Tribes of Israel. It is, therefore, not astonishing that Miss Wallace should be endowed with the Oriental type of beauty and the temperamental requisites that qualify her to appear in Hebraic roles. Her first screen work in Jewish characterization was in "Nihilist Vengeance." Director Sidney Goldin then placed her in the cast of "The Heart of a Jewess." The favorable comments evoked by her acting in that play decided Manager Mark M. Dintenfass to entrust her with the leading feminine role of Esther in "Jewish Freedom Granted by King Casimir of Poland," the historic photo-drama which has just been finished by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Those who have been favored with an advance view of the play declare that Miss Wallace gives a splendid impersonation of the part of Esther, and that the production is destined to be very popular with all classes of moving picture audiences.

THE WAR CORRESPONDENT

Itala "Danmark" Film—Released August 25th

Bretton, a war correspondent, obtains a personal letter from the Minister of War. Bretton meets Clark, correspondent of a rival newspaper. Clark catches sight of Bretton's letters, and resolves to steal them.

The story jumps to the scene of warfare, where Sonia and her father are tending their sheep. The old man is killed by a stray bullet. The two correspondents from the edge of a precipice note a skirmish. Bretton makes a false step and falls. Sonia, in going to his rescue, risks her life. Clark steals the coveted papers. Bretton recovers from his fall and, somewhat smitten by his rescuer, he wanders away. He is arrested as a spy but escapes.

A battle is in progress and both correspondents have their stories ready. Clark is tricked by Sonia and Bretton's telegram goes through. When Clark arrives the wires are congested. Disgruntled, he visits a neighboring theatre. A shell crashes through the building. Clark, among others, is rendered unconscious. Bretton sees the demolition of a majestic war vessel by a hidden mine. Sonia, aiding Bretton, again foils Clark.

DESTROYING THE WIRE

Bretton, to obtain a better view of a land conflict, goes aloft in an aeroplane. Shattered by a shell, it falls. Sonia, who has been captured by the Turks after being wounded, escapes. She sees the aeroplane descend and saves Bretton from being burned to death. Again Bretton is triumphant in getting his story over the wires ahead of Clark. He asks Sonia to return home with him as his wife. The young people on the conclusion of hostilities are congratulated by the newspaper's proprietors. They meet Clark and all differences are ended in a warm handshake.

There is a rapid succession of big and thrilling scenes. A bridge is exploded and the train plunges through the opening into the river. There is much burning of gunpowder, a theatre is destroyed by a bursting shell, and the active manoeuvers of artillery, cavalry and foot soldiers sustain the dramatic interest and cause no end of excitement and suspense throughout the performance.

THREE SCREEN BEAUTIES IN THREE ODD DRAMAS

This Week's Reliance Program Offers a War Drama, a Rural Drama, and a Society Drama

VIVIAN PRESCOTT, Norma Phillips and Edgena de Lespine are the popular stars featured in the coming week's Reliance program, and each of these well-known beauties is seen in a rôle best suited to her particular talents.

In the release of Monday, August 25th, Norma Phillips appears in "The Girl Spy's Atonement," in which she plays a rôle calling for the strongest kind of acting amid the excitement of camp life and the horrors of the battlefield. Miss Phillips rises to the occasion with splendid effect. The story abounds in exciting episodes that sustain intense interest up to the dramatic climax. It is needless to say that the girl spy overcomes all obstacles placed in her way, and her final triumph is the gratifying outcome of her thrilling experiences.

THE GIRL SPY'S ATONEMENT

Vivian Prescott will be seen in the title rôle of the release of Wednesday, August 27th, entitled "Peg of the Polly P." This versatile little actress, acknowledged to be one of the cleverest performers in filmdom, plays the part of Peg, the daughter of a canal boat captain, amid the picturesque settings of the Lehigh Valley. This is one of the quaintest and most interesting productions of the season, abounding in local color and artistic characterization of American types. Edgena de Lespine will be seen on Saturday, August 30th, in the title rôle of "The Social Secretary," which is excellently adapted to her queenly style of beauty, and gives her ample opportunity to display her exceptional ability as an emotional actress which was one of the strong features of her portrayal of "The Bawlerout." She enacts the rôle of the secretary of social proclivities to the very life, and her fashionable gowns and society mannerisms lend verisimilitude to this most entertaining production.

THE SOCIAL SECRETARY

The poor social secretary is Jean Alden, who is employed by the Braggs, a nouveau-riche family, to introduce them into society, and to teach them what to do and say in the fashionable circles. Jean has no easy task before her, as she finds the Braggs household in considerable disorder. Mr. Braggs is in fear of his servants. Fawcett, his business secretary, is making love to Elsie Braggs, the daughter, intending to marry her on account of her money, and young Braggs is a weakling addicted to cocktails and cigarettes, who falls in love with Jean, greatly to her annoyance.

Meanwhile Jean takes charge of the house, puts the servants in their places, instructs Mrs. Braggs in social deportment, and tries to influence Elsie to be cautious in the selection of her intended husband.

Fawcett grows suspicious of her, and fearing that she will interfere with his plans, persuades Mrs. Braggs that Jean is trying to ensnare her son, which leads to her discharge. Jean, however, before leaving exposes Fawcett as a brutal villain and Elsie throws him over.

Despite every effort on the part of Mrs. Braggs to have her remain a member of the household by marrying her son, Jean refuses, and returns to her little son, who is dearer to her than all the money the Braggs can offer.

Moreover, she has learned to prefer domestic happiness to the vapid pleasures of the social whirl.

PEG OF THE POLLY P

STUDIO GOSSIP

Edward J. Le Saint, one of the producers of the Selig Company in California, is back at the home plant after a three weeks' stay with a group of players at Cascada, high up in the Sierras, where the Pacific Light and Power Company is spending millions on one of the most remarkable engineering projects in this country. This work has been undertaken to meet the growing needs of the city of Los Angeles for electrical power which will be conveyed across three hundred miles of desert, of wilderness and of mountains. The Selig traveling stock company was entertained by Engineer F. M. Thebo, in charge of the big work; his assistant Engineer Starr and Commissary Roberts. His elation of these accomplished men far from the refinements and diversions of civilization, is so complete, that they welcomed the artist almost as heaven-sent, and placed every advantage in their power for the advantage of the actors and the makers of the pictures. In fact, nothing was too big or too difficult for these genial mountaineers to undertake for the sake of the camera crowd. The environment of this great enterprise up in the land where the thunder sleeps, opening its way with terrific explosions of dynamite, with daring workmen skidding across dizzy chasms on slender wire cables, wild little lumber cars flashing down endless shoots, vast volume of blue waters cascading over monster dams and monarchs of the forest felled to make way for great flumes, were some of the sights and scenes amid which the picture players acted out their parts.

The Western branch of the Lubin Manufacturing Company is located at 4550 Pasadena avenue, Los Angeles, Cal. The studio is beautifully situated and combines with attractive environment, accessibility to a marked degree. The buildings are located upon a beautiful, well-kept plot of ground, 150x450 feet, which presents all the picturesque beauty and variety of coloring usually found in California gardens. In the rear, a large stage, eighty feet square, around which is grouped commodious property room, wardrobe room, scene dock, paint bridge, etc., supplies the facilities for the interior sets. Adjacent to this are the stables and corrals where the horses, saddles and equestrian equipment are kept. In front is a large and handsomely furnished building of the Colonial type which furnishes quarters for offices, dressing rooms, green room, etc. All in all, it is one of the most attractive and best arranged studios in Los Angeles, and the Lubin Company has been complimented upon its attractive and business-like arrangement. In the rear of the studios are the tracks of the Salt Lake Route. An attractive private station has been built there affording facilities for the arrival and departure of characters by train in the pictureplays. The station has been named "Lowry," in honor of Mr. I. M. Lowry, general manager of the firm.

An extraordinary achievement in night photography was accomplished last week by Director Huntley and Operator Wycoff, of The Selig Polyscope Company, in California, which promises to make the silhouetted sky-line of Los Angeles famed the world over. The camera man planted his instrument on top of Broadway Hill over the tunnel, and after the lamps of nightfall had begun to twinkle, he worked for many hours and was finally rewarded by securing a perfect film of the "City of the Angels," after dark. The lighting system of Los Angeles is in detail and in decoration the most perfect of any city in this country, and the effect secured with the pencils of light and the façades of buildings lining the streets cut clearly against the sky was beautiful beyond compare, giving an effect like fairyland. The success of this experiment means a great deal in the art of pictureplay. The particular drama in which this scene will be used, is entitled "The Shadow of the Bridge." It will be utilized in the form of a dissolve, the visions materializing as the fabric of a dream.

A completely equipped hospital will be added to Universal City's list of metropolitan conveniences. Dr. Grover C. Proctor, a rising young resident physician and surgeon of Boston, is to be the physician in charge. The announcement has just been made by I. Bernstein, the new manager of the Pacific Coast branches of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, who says:

"It is something that has long been needed. There will be no charge for the physician's attention. The only cost to Universal employees will be for the medicine they use. The hospital will be ready for service just as soon as it is possible to build and equip it."

While Universal City has been remarkably free from accidents of a serious nature of sickness, with one thousand persons at the work, the management thinks best to forestall serious results by providing an hospital.

Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott are not confining themselves entirely to picture making, as we learn that they visited recently at the Marble Arch, one of the best known London photoplay houses. The proprietor immediately recognized his talented visitors and Miss Nesbitt was presented with a tremendous bouquet. Marc was less fortunate, as he puts it, for he was called upon to make a speech. He curried instant favor by complimenting the Britons upon their splendid picture houses, and the ideal conditions under which films are projected over there.

Marc has completed arrangements by which he will appear at the famous London Coliseum and deliver a talk on the making of moving pictures. There is no doubt that he can tell the Londoners all about it, as few actors have had the variety of experiences which he has had.

Miss Laura Oakley, chief of police of Universal City, the only woman in the world holding such a position, is wearing a handsome gold chief's badge. It was presented to her by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company through I. Bernstein, general manager of the Pacific Coast branches of the Universal. Beautifully engraved are the words: "Chief of Police of Universal City," and in the centre is Universal Company's trade-mark, the whirling orb.

The presentation of the badge was made by Director Phillips Smalley at one of the delightful dancing parties given weekly on the largest motion picture stage in the world by the Universal Company to its employees. Mr. Smalley made a delightful short speech, congratulating Chief Oakley and voicing the prediction that the position she holds will always be handled capably.

The "Herald Films" are now at work on their first production, a thousand-foot comedy, entitled "Bottled Love." Among the well-known players connected with this company is Babe Saldarini, Madge Kirby, Buddy Ross, Ben Walker and Bill Rising. All these actors are very well known to the patrons of the motion picture theatres, and the comedy is full of laughter from beginning to end. The antics of Babe and Buddy provoke great laughter. Miss Kirby is shown at her best in this production. Mr. Wray Physioc, director of numerous productions, claims this to be his masterpiece.

* * * *

Willard Newell, of the famous Newell Bros., long associated with various forms of theatrical productions, has taken a position as a producer at the Selig Polyscope plant. Mr. Newell's intimate acquaintance with standard drama and the lighter forms of comedy, should qualify him well for work in the new direction. The peculiar gift of putting comedy over through the medium of motography, appears to be rather difficult when it follows the strictly legitimate line, and Mr. Newell's success in this specialty argues well for his stewardship in pictureplay making.

"The Green Eye of the Yellow God" gives Charles Ogle a splendid opportunity in his role of "Mad Carew," a fearless British officer stationed in India who defied the gods of the Hindus and paid the penalty of death. The well-known Edison player has been suffering a good deal of apprehension in real life because of the serious illness of his wife, who, we are glad to say, is now well on the road to recovery.

Miss Vivian Rich, the versatile little leading woman of the "Flying A," will soon appear in a fairy story especially written to please the little folks.

There will be fairies and witches, kings and princes and the enchantment that is interesting to the little readers of "Grimm's."

"I have always wanted to do something of this kind," said Miss Rich, in discussing the story. "I think we ought to do something to please the little folks." It is possible that a series of them will be made.

Harry C. Matthews is producing "Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp" for the next Venus feature. He is doing this while he has the many thousands of dollars' worth of properties over from his last Arabian picture. It would be hard to get such a magnificent assortment together again. There will be a lot of fine trick photography in "Aladdin." Allen Forrest will play the title, Elsie Albert will be the princess and the genii of the lamp and the ring will be in the hands of Joe Burke and Jefferson Osbourne.

The hot days of August have started directors L. Rogers Lytton and William Humphrey on their annual vacations; the former hieing himself to the seashore and the latter going to Maine, where they hope to receive fresh inspiration and renewed vigor within the next two weeks for their arduous labors of the fall and winter campaign.

Mlle. Ideal, the celebrated diver, is to be featured in a two-reel subject entitled "The Diver," by the Vitagraph Company. The picture is now under construction and can be looked forward to as something unusual in which Mlle. Ideal will display her wonderful powers as a swimmer in a most dramatic pictureplay.

Ben Wilson does not have much time to devote to his chug-chug wagon these days. In fact. the popular Edison player is working about twenty-four hours a day. In addition to playing Captain Bradford in the "Who Will Marry Mary?" pictures, and appearing as the scapegrace brother in "Joyce of the North Woods," he plays five different parts in "The Awakening of a Man," a two-reel film. Mr. Wilson appears in every scene in the entire two reels, but, with his usual cleverness, he has made a distinct character study of each role.

* * * *

Lottie Briscoe, of the Lubin Company, at their California studio, occupies one of the prettiest dressing rooms to be found in the whole range of motion picture studios. It is rose pink throughout—rugs, walls, chairs and draperies. Every summer afternoon she is to be found, when opportunity offers, on the grand-stand watching a baseball game, and in winter she is equally devoted to the opera. Between times she finds cheer and comfort in a baby grand piano made to order for her, from her own designs.

If Mabel Trunnelle were asked to choose the kind of part she wanted to play, her choice would fall upon just such a character as Polly Eccles in "Caste." The lighthearted, winsome girl whose sordid surroundings seem only to increase her gaiety appeals to the clever actress, and her interpretation of the part is one that will stand out in its refreshing beauty as one of the best that this talented photoplay star has done.

* * * *

It is astonishing how many of the great legitimate stage directors are going over to the moving picture studios in Los Angeles. James Neill has gone to the Universal, Dave Hartford to the Kay Bee and it is stated that Willus Marks is about to make a third. All in one week, too.

The European business manager of The Vitagraph Company, is here to study American conditions in anticipation of increased facilities being added to the Paris factory and probably the erection of a large studio in Europe.

Two new directors have been added to the Vitagraph studio staff—Ned Finley and Tefft Johnson, who will in future be recognized as both directors and actors.

* * * *

Herbert Prior, whose versatile talents have long since made him one of the leading players on the screen, has written another comedy in which he plays the leading part, "The Desperate Condition of Mr. Boggs."

* * * *

Both Jack Johnson and Miss Barbara Tennant, who have been away on vacations, are back at work at Eclair and more of those strong feature productions featuring these two favorites are under way.

* * * *

When it was discovered that Millie Bright, the little Eclair beauty, is an exceptionally daring and clever diver, it was decided to stage a production in which she could do some "Kellerman" stunts. It can be expected this fall.

If you ever see handsome Charles Horan, of the Dragon films, ask him if he would accept an offer as ringmaster of a circus.

He traveled one week with the Sautell, Lowande and Rollins circus, portraying the ringmaster in a forthcoming state right release, "Her Last Ride."

He rode at the head of the street parade, snapped the whip at each performance, and bossed around the circus help, but "Oh, what a life it is," says he.

Jack Noble, of Dragon films, has been seen on Broadway, and we are real glad that he is around. He says he will be directing again in a few days.

Clarkson P. Ryttenberg is a busy man these days. "The Blindness of Courage" or "Between Two Loves" is going fast, but a few states are still available.

* * * *

The artist who makes the "Newlywed" and other trick pictures over at the Ft. Lee studio of Eclair has just finished a comedy subject of five hundred feet which has taken a solid month of hard work to put together. It is entitled "A Vegetarian's Dream" and shows some very amusing antics of vegetables, lemons, etc. This five hundred feet of film is made from some eighty thousand drawings and by some exceptionally clever trick work. When it comes to the showing of the lemons becoming pigs and playing leap frog, this part is not made from drawings and it will keep the public guessing for many weeks to understand how it has been done.

ROMAINE FIELDING

The popular Lubin star actor who was the winner in a recent popularity contest. Mr. Fielding is too well known to need any introduction. His dramas are not only thrilling representations of Western life, but they go to the very heart of things; they get the atmosphere of lives spent in the vast expanses of the world. Therein lies the genius of the man. He understands the real difference between the West and the East.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Writing Is a Trade

WRITING is a trade—writing is hard work. Literary craftsmen, good ones, no longer affect Bohemianism and permit their hair to grow long. They are workmen who look upon their literary occupation as everyday business. We state this, to some a heart-rending fact, because many of our correspondents seem to think that they must become "inspired"—go into a trance as it were, before the muse will perch upon their shoulders. They appear to have gained the impression that the successful literary worker is quite an extraordinary person, when the fact remains that he is just a very industrious person, with a habit of observation. Take Alfred Henry Lewis, for instance. Mr. Lewis, author of the "Wolfville" stories, etc., is nothing of the traditional author. "Writing is a trade," he said the other day. "It is as much a trade as bricklaying or assembling automobiles. It is a different sort of trade, to be sure, but it is a trade none the less. Writers that I know do not evolve their copy out of their own brains. They are merely assemblers and finishers of other men's things. They merely go about gathering together bits of life. These bits of life, these little expressions and incidents, the writer weaves together and makes into a plot and story. Mark Twain, Stevenson, Conan Doyle, and all the rest of the real writers, were assemblers. They simply worked over the material they had taken unconsciously from other writers, and from life, and had stored away in the cellars of their brains. I can take every one of my books and give you a name and address for every little expression, every little action, every incident."

The same rule applies to photoplaywriting. A moving picture story as completed by the author is apt to contain a little of this and that gathered from the four corners of experience and observation. These little things are assembled, perhaps from a thought germ hastily jotted down in the observer's notebook, and finally there is assembled the completed structure, which is the photoplay script. Photoplay writing is a trade just as is fiction writing. It may take a so-called genius to write the photoplay or the magazine story—but genius, you know, is just a capacity for taking pains and working hard.

Another "School" Thumped

C. J. Caine, a Milwaukee photoplaywright, sends us the following letter and a clipping: "Enclosed find clipping from a local paper which may interest you, as it surely illustrates just what kind of men are running the moving picture 'schools' at present. A friend wanted me to investigate before he took 'lessons.' I visited the 'studio' and had a talk with the 'professor.' I have only been in the photoplay game a year, but I dare say I could direct far better than this man who claimed he had been producing plays for eight years. During my conversation I mentioned several familiar expressions used by photoplaywrights such as 'punch,' etc., and, judging from his blank expression, they were entirely foreign to him. If you consider it worth while, I wish you would publish an account of this in your department, as it is a shame to have such people separating ambitious ones from their money. I have just seen my first script, 'At Shiloh' (Bison) produced and am more determined than ever to succeed. Your advice in the News has been very helpful to me and I wish to thank you for your sincere encouragement." Now the clipping from the Milwaukee newspaper:

BREAK UP "SCHOOL"

POLICE NAB MOTION PICTURE ACADEMY HEAD

Girl Complains He Swindled Her—Would-be Film Stars Find Their Careers Blasted

"Detectives Jacob Laubenheimer and Louis Hartman walked into room 403, Matthews building, Monday afternoon, and arrested Rudolph von Nagel, alias Frank M. Arnold. As they started to leave the room with their prisoner the sound of voice topped them. The voices were those of females. 'Harold—come thou here! How coulds't thou do this thing? Did I not place the jewels in thy hands?' Another female voice replied: 'Ah, Madra! I would kneel before thee! Forgive me if thou canst! To ask thee to forget is more than I can do!' Detective Laubenheimer threw open the door. Seven girls shrieked, clutched their 'lines' and shrank into the corner—and seven dreams of future greatness as moving picture actresses were smashed! Von Nagel, or Arnold, as he was known in Milwaukee, it is charged started a 'school for actresses' two weeks ago with a small table for equipment, and has since been advertising for 'inexperienced girls.' He is charged with obtaining money by false pretenses. The police say he admits charging each girl from $5 to $20, agreeing to pay them from $20 to $50 a week to perform in moving picture plays."

A Line from Chicago

A Chicago scribe, after thanking us for what she is pleased to term some valuable hints, asks how song writers are to know so-called swindling publishers from legitimate publishers. She feels that Mr. E. M. Wicks, song writer, whom we quoted in a previous issue, would be doing an act of great kindness if he would give more hints. "Much hard-earned money has been spent in paying would-be publishers and the returns received by song writers are frequently a few copies of music. I have known of writers who got nothing for their money. I have been beaten badly at that game but, nevertheless, I am still writing songs and looking for a genuine publisher who will take a beginner's work. You are doing a good work in your field of endeavor, now pass along this other request," ends the letter.

We have never attempted to write songs, believing that such inspirations as "In My Harem" and "When the Midnight Choo-Choo Leaves for Alabam'" were beyond our humble talents. However, we sympathize with those who have been victimized by bogus song publishers and that is why we gave space to Mr. Wicks' excellent assertions. We advise those interested in song-writing to address The Writer's Magazine, 32 Union Square, East, New York. Doubtless, Mr. Wicks will give communications his personal attention, providing postage is enclosed with the letter. We believe the magazine publishes a department for song writers.

Thankfully Received

One of our correspondents puts this across: "Your statement that scripts are being returned fresh and crisp is a refreshing bit of information and thankfully received. Not long ago one of my scripts came back with nearly every page smeared with tobacco-stained finger marks. The appearance of the script and the length of time they kept it led me to surmise that they had been using it for a door-mat and hated to part with it." Maybe this writer waxes sarcastic, but there is good excuse. We know his feelings and can sympathize with him.

As to Grammar

Our recent assertion that a slang expression sometimes carries more force than the carefully constructed grammatical sentence evidently started something. Of several arguments pro and con which we have received, we offer the following as Exhibit A: "It depends somewhat on what the 'grammatical error' committed is. There are many slang phrases which, of course, are more or less grammatically incorrect but they convey the meaning of the writer more forcibly than the 'Queen's English.' Ungrammatical expressions, generally speaking, cannot be tolerated. I consider ability to use only grammatical expressions a necessary qualification for writers who hope to be successful. One writer sends in a story based upon a grand idea. Imagine the script couched in ungrammatical expressions and the editor floundering around in a mass of woods which render it an impossibility for him to make anything from it. Use correct grammar, by all means."

Certainly, use correct grammar if possible. But we reiterate that because a man is not highly educated, or an adept at grammar, it doesn't bar him from successful pictureplay writing as it would bar him from other literary pursuits. The best reporter we ever knew couldn't write his story to save his life. He tried to, but the rewrite man was always busily engaged on the reporter's stuff. But that reporter had the ideas. He could find a 'story' where others could find nothing. Maybe you have the ideas and not the ability to develop them in the best of grammar. We repeat, do not let that fact worry you. If your idea stands out and is of value, you will do business with the efficient script editor. And as to "floundering around in a mass of words," it is not the uneducated man, or the writer with limited vocabulary that generally does the "floundering," it is the grammarian, the lover of high-sounding adjectives, who frequently utilizes two pages of manuscript to tell that which could clearly be described in a hundred words.

Pertinent Pointers

Give thought to your titles.

Always make a carbon copy of everything you write. Don't number your scenes in letters or Roman numerals. Use everyday plain figures at the side of the sheet. We were shown a script the other day, the action laid out as "Scene A; scene B," etc., centered on the page. We do not approve of such innovations.

Script writing more naturally leads to short-story writing than does short-story writing to pictureplay writing. Maybe some of those rejected pictureplay plots could be worked into magazine fiction. We know three writers who have recently worked rejected pictureplays into successful short fiction. We plead guilty to being one of the three.

It isn't the style that counts in the pictureplay script. It is the building up of an idea in as terse a manner as is possible with comprehensive clearness. Let style take care of itself, and perhaps it will if you put over your pictureplay action clearly and concisely and logically.

We do not charge for answering questions by mail. All that is required is a stamped and self-addressed envelope. We are here to do all the good we can, in all the ways we can, and to everybody we can, and so feel no hesitancy about availing yourself of this opportunity. To those who have received no answers to inquiries, we would state that the reason is that the one rule necessary to qualify has not been observed.

Successful dramatists have made a careful and thorough study of the stage. It is also necessary for pictureplaywrights to make careful and thorough study of the moving picture screen in order to succeed. Practical knowledge of the art is gained by familiarity with moving pictures.

How often must we warn ambitious writers not to copy other films? After all that has been said on this subject, a number of would-be pictureplaywrights are persisting in revamping stories they have seen in picture theatres and submitting them to the editors as strictly original stuff. Authors do not seem to realize that when htis action is persisted in, the editors will view everything they write with dark suspicion and that, eventually, all markets will be closed to them.

Ladies and children are great patrons of moving picture theatres. Keep them in mind when writing your plots. Why is it that some writers who are punctilious in the drawing-room will hasten home and write the most nauseating drivel for the moving picture screen? Be clean, and remember that every suggestive picture that is released does an untold damage to the art in general.

Endeavor to write short sentences. Too many scripts are composed of compound sentences and long-drawn-out paragraphs which could well be condensed. Short sentences carry force. An ability to put a good sentence together is desirable.

Biffs and Boosts

Appleton, Wis.—"Three cheers for you for that gentle hint in this week's issue to eliminate the death-bed scenes. I have never known it to fail that when I sought joy at the moving pictures, I would usually find myself weeping instead. Good luck to you and your departments. You have surely done wonders for me in cheering me on my way to fame and fortune in the scenario line."

Los Angeles, Cal.—"You trade-journal editors do more harm than good. Too much attention is paid to such vaporings. You all have something to sell, and if it is not a course of lessons it is a text-book, an operator's manual, or some other graft. I never read your drivel, because you indulge in personal abuse and not in facts."

New York City.—"Dear Mr. Wright: I want to thank you for virtually selling two scenarios for me the other day. From your column I learned that I was trying to write stories instead of pictureplays. I took two rejected scenarios and cut them to the quick, and I made the synopsis of one seventy-five words long and the other under two hundred words. I have sold both, receiving $35 for the two."

New Orleans, La.—"After getting onto your paper, a year ago, and studying your department, I took an old magazine story that I could not sell, rewrote it into a pictureplay, and sold it that way. I received $15 for it, which is considerably more than the price of a year's subscription to the News. Thank you."

Columbus, Ga.—"I write you on behalf of the correspondence schools. I took a course and was treated all right. You have some axe to grind when you jump on these schools so often. What do you know about schools, anyway? Did you ever go to school? I, and many others, believe not."

Indianapolis, Ind.—"Dear Sir: You are a 'nut.' That's all I have to say."

Editorial Etchings

A. W. Thomas is now editor-in-chief of Photoplay Magazine.

Lloyd Lonergan is the name of the editor who has written about two-thirds of all Thanhouser stories ever produced. He has been running his department without any assistance for the past few weeks.

A complete novel from the pen of Maibelle Heikes Justice will appear in the "Red Book" soon. Miss Justice has been writing much of the big stuff produced by Selig and Essanay. She has been spending the summer in Illinois but goes East soon.

Monte Katterjohn, who once conducted a "school" and a monthly magazine for pictureplaywrights, has returned to his "first love," namely, script-writing.

Captain Peacocke, veteran script writer, now on the Universal editorial staff, is a veritable soldier of fortune. He has been a soldier, explorer, revolutionist among other minor experiences. He also writes poetry and short stories, and writes them well.

Hugh D'Arcy, publicity man for Lubin Manufacturing Company, is the author of those noted verses called "The Face on the Barroom Floor." We had the pleasure of hearing the author recite the poem recently and were certainly pleased with the opportunity to hear an accomplished recital of immortal verse.

With the "Professors"

"You can easily write a photoplay in twenty minutes after learning the proper form, and each play is worth from $25 to $100 to you," so reads a New York City "institute" prospectus we received to-day from a long-suffering subscriber. The above we honestly regard as the limit in "school" literature.

A Toledo, O., newspaper prints an advertisement addressed to "boys and girls," urging them to spend vacation in learning "to weave a plot and receive big money." Complete course costs only $2.50. We would remark that there are childish scripts a-plenty without foisting more upon the defenseless script editor.

Lifted from Fiction

The editor of this department upon several occasions has secured the permission of certain magazine editors to use his stories in moving picture form and they have met with a ready sale. Now comes Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice with the script, "When Tony Pawned Luisa." This is a dramatization of Miss Justice's story of the same name which appeared full page in the Sunday New York Herald. It is interesting to note, for it is the first fiction of Miss Justice to appear on the screen, although she is a prolific writer of short stories. The film is a Lubin release and the script is followed closely in regard to plot. This is a note of interest to script writers—that fiction is sometimes written so that it can be lifted almost direct to the screen despite the fact that so many say the contrary.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

Helen Marten is nursing a badly bruised knee as the result of a little realism in a scene taken during the recent trip of the Eclair Company to the Adirondacks. The picture under way was "The Wolf," a coming release. Miss Marten was hidden in a cupboard and then in order to get the action "over" it was necessary to have this cupboard fall with Miss Marten in it. It was impossible to "fake" the scene and so the little lady had to stand for the rough handling. It was a bad fall and she got some severe bruises but was game and finished out the scene before she let out a yelp.

Mr. S. L. Lesser, of San Francisco, president of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, and who is also identified with the Pacific Feature Film Company and the Northwestern Feature Film Company, of Portland, Ore., is on a business trip to New York. Mr. Lesser reports big business for the feature film and he will make some good contracts while in this city.

Joe Brandt will leave for Europe on Tuesday, August 26th, to organize a big publicity campaign for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. He will be away three months.

FEATURE FILM NOTES

"Arizona," the All Star Feature Corporation's play in motion pictures, is nearing completion. Augustus Thomas and Laurence McGill have been handling an army of men and horses during the past three weeks. The heaviest of the two hundred and ten scenes required to present the play have already been made. The first three thousand feet of positive film showing the progress of the work was projected at the company's exhibition rooms on Monday for the benefit of the officers of the company and a few of the leading players. An officer of the company states that it will not be necessary to retake any of the scenes made so far as the general quality is excellent. "Arizona" is scheduled for release about September 15th.

The All Star Feature Corporation announces that negotiations have been concluded for the acquisition of "Soldiers of Fortune," one of the most popular novels of the past decade, by Richard Harding Davis, and later dramatized by Augustus Thomas. The author has granted to the All Star Feature Corporation the sole rights to the book and the rights for use of the play have been granted by the Henry B. Harris estate. Augustus Thomas is preparing the scenario for motion picture reproduction and "Soldiers of Fortune" with a star cast will be the second release of the All Star Feature Corporation.

A newly organized corporation, whose large capital has already caused several widely-known and experienced feature exchange men to acknowledge their readiness to cast their lot with it, has been in active negotiation with Joseph R. Miles, manager of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, for the handling of the Exclusive's feature output in Eastern Pennsylvania and Southern New Jersey.

G. H. Verbeck, of the Buffalo Film Exchange, was in New York last week for the purpose of gathering details about the Exclusive's proposal for New York State.

H. J. Palmer, known in the exchange business in Knoxville, Tenn., intends contracting for the exclusive program for South Carolina, Georgia and Florida.

Through a mix-up at the wharves, a large consignment of films, including a number of prints of a new Itala feature, was accidentally shipped to Vera Cruz, Mexico, instead of being delivered to the Exclusive Supply Corporation's offices in the Candler Building, New York City.

H. C. Moran, representing the Judson Freight Forwarding Company, who handle the Itala import shipments, is actively pursuing the errant features. By the aid of wireless he has communicated with the captain of the coast vessel, who will endeavor to transfer the cases to a northbound vessel.

What promises to be quite an innovation is assured by the announcement of Warner's Features, Inc., that all-star features of four, five or six reels will be produced at intervals of three months with the star talent of their manufacturers working together in one gigantic company. These productions will be included with the regular output of three three-reel features weekly as an added attraction. It is not difficult to enthuse over the prospect of seeing Marion Leonard, Gene Gauntier, Constance Crawley, Edith Bostwick, Jack J. Clark, Arthur Maude, and those child actors, Matty and Early, working in harmony in one big motion picture.

Warner's Features, Inc., have secured some notable productions for their feature program to be inaugurated the middle of September. Chief of interest among those is a four-reel version of Count Tolstoi's great tragedy, "The Living Corpse," produced in Europe, where the original settings were to be had in keeping with the theme. The character of Fedia Protassoff is portrayed by Dillo Lombardi, an actor of great power and versatility. Maria Jacobini plays the part of Lisa, the wife, while Livia Mertins is responsible for the role of Mascha, the gipsy.

Joseph Spero, who has held important executive positions with both the Mutual and Universal film companies, has affiliated himself with the new Warner's Features, Inc., as assistant field manager to H. M. Warner. Mr. Spero has left New York City for a tour of inspection of the Warner exchanges, stopping first at Washington, D. C., where he will remain long enough to place that office in readiness to handle the exclusive feature program to be released on September 15th, and then proceed through the South and West. Mr. Spero is very well known to exhibitors the country over, having established offices for the Mutual Film Corporation in Springfield, Mass., and Buffalo, N. Y., and reorganized the Mutual offices in Cleveland, Toledo and Detroit. While connected with the Universal, Mr. Spero opened offices for that organization in Springfield, Mass.

A coterie of recognized screen stars has been induced to sign contracts with Warner's Features, Inc., to appear in three-reel features as a part of the exclusive feature program to be instituted about the middle of September. Among those secured up to this time are: Gene Gauntier, Marion Leonard, Constance Crawley, Elsie Albert, Edith Bostwick, Jack J Clark, Arthur Maude and Matty and Early, the clever juveniles. Negotiations are on foot with several other well-known interpreters of the silent drama whose names will be announced at a later date. Warner's exclusive feature program promises to be a huge drawing card and meritorious in every way.

"Francesca da Rimini"—Dante's immortal story—picturized by America's premier dramatic director, J. Farrell MacDonald, in three parts, from the version by Gabriele D'Annunzio—this is the latest announcement of Warner's Features, Inc. The photoplay has been completed and will be included in the feature program to be inaugurated about the 15th of September. Miss Constance Crawley takes the part of Francesca; Arthur Maude that of Giovanni Malatesta (Giancotto), the lame brother. Director MacDonald was fortunate indeed to secure the services of those renowned international artists. Miss Crawley first came into prominence at His Majesty's Theatre, London, under Sir Herbert Tree. She holds the world's record audience, having played to 10,000 people at the Greek Theatre, Berkeley, Cal. (This is 2,500 more than Bernhardt at the same place.) Miss Crawley is a direct descendant of Sir Walter Raleigh, the best actor of his time in England. Arthur Maude has made himself well known in the States. He played for five years with Mr. Martin Harvey in England, then came to America and toured this country with Henry Irving.

Mr. Machat, of the Standard Feature Film Company, Inc., of Boston, has purchased the New England States territory of the three-reel Dragon feature "The Blindness of Courage" or "Between Two Loves."

The American-Eclair Company has just completed a three-reel production of "Rob Roy" and has under way a magnificent portrayal of "Evangeline," also in three reels. This company has made a number of classical productions with great success and will continue to produce recognized literary classics. It is a peculiar coincidence that both of these productions which are now in pictures with the Eclair trademark attached should be under preparation for production in dramatic form on Broadway this fall. It happens, however, that the Eclair Company had made arrangements to film both "Rob Roy" and "Evangeline" long before any one connected with the company had any idea that the same books were to be used for Broadway productions. The director who put on "Rob Roy" had already done this film in Europe some time ago and the "Evangeline" scenario had been accepted and work began on the preparation for the production at Ft. Lee just ten days before the first announcement was made of the coming production with Miss Edna Goodrich in the title rôle.

THE BLINDNESS OF COURAGE, OR BETWEEN TWO LOVES

Dragon Three-Reel Feature—Produced by the Ryno Film Company

A most interesting Dragon feature production is about to be released under the title of "The Blindness of Courage, or Between Two Loves." It was thrown on the screen last Thursday for the benefit of a News representative, and proved exceptionally effective.

The military scenes are capitally depicted, and the acting throughout is of an equally high order of merit. The military costumes of the period in which the plot is laid are most picturesque, and the gorgeous make-up of the Indians, in all its variegated assortment, also lend life and lustre to the production. The main incidents of the romantic story are as follows:

The Governor of one of the French forts in America, about the time of the French and Indian War, has a very beautiful daughter, with whom all the young courtiers are infatuated. Of all these courtiers the captain and the young lieutenant are the favored suitors, and the girl being of a rather frivolous nature is unable to decide between the two.

One evening at a reception and ball given by the Governor the girl has been the attraction of all the courtiers, who insist on waiting on her, and in a fit of pique she calls all the courtiers about her and proclaims she will marry the man who brings to her a relic taken from the sacred burying ground of the Indians, which can be seen from the window far up on a cliff overlooking the sea. The courtiers eagerly accept these conditions and decide to set out immediately, but the captain stops them at the door and declares that the man who volunteers to go must first meet him in mortal combat.

The young lieutenant accepts the challenge and the two, with their respective parties, set out on their quest.

Upon reaching the foot of the cliff they are warned by the Indians not to ascend, but they disregard the warning. The two parties meet and soon the captain and lieutenant are seen fighting the duel in which the lieutenant wounds the captain and leads his party up the precipice. The captain is in a rage, and connives with the Indians to revenge their dead chieftain, from whom the relic has been taken.

The lieutenant in the meantime is flushed with victory at having gained his point, and soon descends the precipitous incline and joins the Indians in their stockade council chamber where a banquet is in progress.

At a given signal when the lieutenant and his party are seated the Indians rush in upon them and an explosion occurs in which most of the lieutenant's party are killed. The lieutenant escapes, but he is blind and gropes his way about the mountain, where he is found in a pitiable condition by an Indian girl. She leads him back to the camp where the Indians threaten to kill him, but are restrained because they are very superstitious about killing a man who is blind.

The captain in the meantime returns to the fort with the news that the entire party has been annihilated. He now arduously presses his suit for the girl's hand, and the Governor is very much in favor of it.

The lieutenant wanders abjectly through the Indian camp and is closely attended by the young Indian girl, who is deeply in love with him. However, he is kept a close captive and cannot make his way to the fort. Nightly he sees visions of his loved one for whom he has risked his life, but he is silent and goes through the ordeal manfully.

The Governor's daughter, being satisfied that the lieutenant is dead, agrees to marry the captain. On the eve of the wedding the lieutenant sees a vision of the altar of the little old church where the girl and his rival are being made one. He gets up with a start and rushes out of the wigwam into the cold night, where he wanders, trying to find his way back to the fort.

The Indian girl, however, has seen him leave the wigwam and is close in pursuit and just saves him from drowning as he is blindly wading into the river. He begs her to leave him, and tells her the story of the girl back in the fort. Finally she is persuaded to lead him to his people. They arrive at the fort just as the priest is about to perform the ceremony. The lieutenant rushes into the blockade, and with raised hands stops the ceremony. He is not recognized and the only way he has of proving that he is the lost lieutenant is by drawing the relic of the Indian chieftain from his shirt and showing it before the astonished congregation. The Governor's daughter rushes to him and fondly embraces him. The lieutenant relates the captain's treachery, and the captain leaves in shame, while the lieutenant is wedded to the Governor's daughter.

Then the little Indian girl returns to the trysting place by the big river and mourns for her lost lover.

Ramo will produce two releases each month. Some excellent subjects are already announced. On September 1st "The Worker" will be released and "Cards" on September 15th. Both are three-reel subjects, and Manager C. Lang Cobb assures us they are fully up to the standard. Excellent posters have been prepared and good business is predicted for the Ramo this fall.

The above illustration shows Forsyth, an Edison camera man, taking a scene from "Starved Out." The whole story centers around the houseboat, which is the property of Ashley Miller, the Edison Director. It is only occasionally that the camera man is given a chance to do "heroics," that generally being the lot of the actor or the actors. In this particular case Forsyth had his troubles, though as a matter of fact he did not fall overboard—it would have been a much better story if he had.

GEORGE KLEINE, the man who put Cines in Cinematography, called on Senator Hanna, of Ohio, thirteen years ago. It was on the eve of the McKinley Presidential campaign, one of the most exciting political battles in the history of the United States. Kleine had an idea. He wanted to put William McKinley in moving pictures and show those pictures to the people of every cross-roads in this country.

Senator Hanna, as everybody knows, was about the smoothest political manager in Christendom. McKinley rather liked the moving picture publicity idea but Hanna pondered. He said to Kleine: "The motion picture is dead, and your idea would prove a fizzle."

That was thirteen years ago. Who peered the farthest into the future, Senator Hanna of Ohio, or George Kleine?

* * * *

"Let George Do It" seems to be the axiom in moving picture land. Needless, perhaps, to remark, George does it. What he has recently done with "Quo Vadis" has caused weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth along the Rialto. What he will do with "The Last Days of Pompeii" —but that is another story, per Kipling.

When "Quo Vadis" opened in the Hippodrome at Cleveland, O., recently to S. R. O., George Kleine dropped into the city. He was discovered by Archie Bell of the Plain-Dealer, and Mr. Kleine said some pertinent things anent moving pictures. "The moving picture is still in its infancy," said Mr. Kleine. "Such films as 'Quo Vadis' merely show the possibilities that lie ahead of us in this department of the moving picture business. In everything we follow the lines of least resistance. We have been so busy preparing the films that we thought would make money, that several distinct lines have never been touched. We haven't had time to even get our logical bearings. Just to speak of myself, why, I have plans for the future that make everything I have yet offered seem to be mere child's play. The educational end hasn't begun. Motion pictures will not supplant books in the public schools, according to my opinion, but they will revolutionize our educational system. Instead of being bored, the child in school is going to love to learn by seeing. Another field is the news picture. When this field is properly developed, all the news events of the world will be available in picture as they are in the daily newspaper. Miscroscopical work has barely been touched. The day will come when every country doctor will be able to see operations performed by the world's most eminent surgeons. Another field will be devoted entirely to public health.

"Just look what we accomplished with the film called 'The Fly Pest.' In my opinion this film did more to warn people of the fly horror than anything else in the world. It was adopted for a systematic campaign against flies by twelve state boards of health in America. The state of Louisiana put the pictures on a special train and permitted all the inhabitants of the state to see them. It was the picture that really started the national campaign showing what is possible in all other lines of warning the public against disease."

Mr. Kleine is probably the only leader in cinematography that practically "grew up in the business." His father was a manufacturer of stereopticons and his youth was spent in an optical store. He outfitted lecturers. He went in for motion pictures as soon as anybody and he made money from the jump. Then with a comfortable fortune, Kleine thought he would retire and enjoy himself. Did he? He did not. A few weeks of the retirement business got on Kleine's nerves and, in a short time, he was "up to his neck" in moving picture business details and will be in the business now until the end of his life.

"European makers are ahead in choice of subject, manner of production, treatment of subject and acting," asserts Mr. Kleine. "The actors in 'Quo Vadis' are not great actors at home, not celebrated actors; but they are good actors. Even the members of the mob are good actors. Our next production, "The Last Days of Pompeii,' will be a larger production than 'Quo Vadis.' We heard of a big strike in an automobile factory at Turin. We sent our agents there and engaged the men for pictures. We have about 3,000 persons in the new film, and the entire city of Pompeii was built of stucco with the giant Vesuvius towering behind it. The destruction of Pompeii and the volcanic explosion will last seven minutes before the camera. It will be the biggest spectacle ever witnessed by the world—seated in a theatre.

"We have to be careful in making announcements. What is called competition has swamped many. Some of us who care to engage in purely legitimate transactions, and quickly put $100,000 into the making of a great feature film, will find our idea has been stolen bodily by a small firm, a fake film is offered to the public and we are in danger of losing the value of much of our advertising. I notice that our advertisements say something about this 'Quo Vadis' being a spectacle that cost $150,000. It may be interesting to note that over $200,000 was spent on it before we took in one penny at the box office. In some ways this picture teaches manufacturers a lesson. I think it is about as long as a pictureplay should be; that is, a film drama should not be longer than an acted drama, and the people become weary after two and a half hours, no matter how good the attraction may be. I shall prefer silent pictures until the day arrives when we may have exact reproduction of the human voice—and this is certain to come. I think a voice speaking in the 'Quo Vadis' pictures would be resented by the public that views them. By watching the silent pictures, particularly those made by foreign actors, we are learning to understand pantomime as never before in the history of the world. That is a good thing, it seems to me, for pantomime is one of the highest forms of dramatic art."

"Will motion pictures take the place of the regular drama?"

"There will always remain the desire to see actors in life. I think that films will not supplant actors, and I think that actors who become well known to film patrons, gain in popularity as a result. At the picture exposition in New York recently, nothing struck me more forcibly than the popularity of the actors of the different companies who were recognized by the visitors at the palace of liberal arts. Some of these actors received marks of favor rarely accorded to a regular actor of the stage. I believe Julia Marlowe would become a more popular actress and E. H. Sothern a much more popular actor if motion pictures of their performances were shown among people who are deprived of seeing them because of their box office rates, and because via the moving pictures they would be enabled to give performances in cities that have never been and never will be visited by them. The cry that moving pictures are hurting the regular theatre is absurd. I believe the minds of the younger generation are being prepared for the theatre as never before in the history of the world."

"What will be your next big move?"

"For obvious reasons I cannot give my plans in detail, but in the immediate future I shall devote myself to one particular line. I am arranging to have several celebrated actors and actresses visit the scenes of famous plays and enact the tragedies on the ground. Also, we are arranging with several of the most famous composers to rewrite and personally supervise the cutting of their scores for orchestras which will accompany the filmed enactments of their operas which will be acted by the most famous living singers.

"Motion picture actor's salaries have increased as have the salaries of regular actors on the stage," concluded Mr. Kleine. "When somebody filmed Henry E. Dixey years ago and gave him $1,000 for posing, the manufacturer felt as if he were giving away his soul. To-day the prominent actor would want $1,000 for reading over the contract before breakfast. Just before I sailed for Europe a representative of Liebler & Co., called upon me making a proposition to film Viola Allen in 'The Christian.' For this privilege I found that I would have to pay $10,000 cash to Miss Allen, one third of the world's rights to Hall Caine, a percentage of the gross receipts to Liebler & Co., and a few other percentages that would make the deal rather complicated."

George Kleine has accomplished much for the uplift and refinement of the moving picture. He will do more. He is not one of those personages who think that the filming of the classics is uninteresting and tiresome. He has a heap of good common sense and knows that the clergyman, the schoolmaster, and the father and the mother, are all with him in his endeavor. For what is more enjoying and at the same time educating than an accurate presentation of "Quo Vadis," "The Last Days," or any other classic for that matter? More power to Kleine and his kind, say we!

LORIMER JOHNSTON

Lorimer Johnston, now directing the first company of the American "Flying A" players, presages great things from this talented group of actors.

Mr. Johnston is a native of Kentucky, being a grand-nephew of the celebrated Confederate General Albert Sidney Johnston, who was in command of the Confederate army at the time of his death, which occurred during the first day's battle of Shiloh. Mr. Johnston was for some years on the dramatic stage and has to his credit not only a series of successful productions of plays in New York, but has successful plays in his own writing. Two years ago he realized the great advance the moving pictures were making, and also that therein lay a field to which the knowledge he had gained of the stage and the world in general through extensive travel in America and in many parts of Europe, Asia and Africa could well be applied to the production of pictures. He therefore went to Europe and for a year studied in the studios at Rome, Paris and Copenhagen. On his return to America he became a producer in a Chicago plant and after some time there went to the Pacific Coast where he is now director with the American Film Mfg. Co. He has already scored with a number of two-reel productions such as "Truth in the Wilderness," "The Scapegoat," "Adventures of Jacques" and "For the Crown."

Mr. Johnston holds the distinguished honor of being the last holder of an office of which Benjamin Franklin was the first. He was appointed Bearer of Dispatches for the President, and held this office for six years, running into the second year of Mr. Cleveland's administration, when the office was abolished by the Democratic party in their endeavor to a policy of retrenchment and the office has never been restored. The holding of this office gave Mr. Johnston the opportunity of meeting the elect men of Europe, not only the reigning monarchs which was an essential part of his duties, but the various Ministers who held the Portfolio of Foreign Affairs in their own countries. Among these were Benj. Disraeli (Earl of Beaconsfield), Gladstone, Andrassy, Gortchikoff, Casimir-Perier, and many others. Mr. Johnston has a record of fourteen transatlantic trips and his voyages elsewhere have taken him to Wadi-Elforo (at the second cataract of the Nile) into the Soudan. He has made extensive research in the ruins of Nineveh, and was a guest of the Rajah Brooks at Sarawak in Borneo. Speaking a number of languages, his one great ambition is to take a company to the out of the way places of the world and produce such pictures as shall form the value of advanced study in motion picture production.

The cover of The Photoplay Magazine for September has a three-color reproduction of a photograph of Jack Kerrigan and Vivian Rich posing on a mountain top. The contents embrace photographic art studies of leading players, stories written from current photoplays, biographies of well-known players, and other matter of interest to photoplay fans. The illustrations and the absence of decorative borders adds much to their effectiveness. The publishers deserve much praise for their efforts to raise the standard of photoplay publications.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

In 1911 the Inventors' Guild petitioned President Taft to secure the appointment of a special commission for the purpose of making a thorough and careful study of the American patent system and situation and to report to Congress such changes as might be found expedient. President Taft responded by sending a special message to Congress on the patents system in which the recommendations of the Guild were indorsed. Congress did absolutely nothing in the matter. There is good reason to believe that President Wilson is not indifferent to the subject, judging from his comments thereon in his "New Freedom," where, referring to the difficulty many inventors now experience in "reaping the full fruits of their ingenuity and industry," he states emphatically that "one of the reforms waiting to be undertaken is a revision of our patent laws." Whether he will give the matter special and personal attention is another story, and dependent largely upon the manner in which the subject is urged upon him under present strenuous conditions. If, however, the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country would heed the request of the Inventors' Guild, as set forth in our report last week, the desired result would be assured. Representing, as said chambers do, the industrial interests of hundreds of thousands dependent upon justice and fairness in the granting and upholding of patent rights, their united request could not be ignored by either President or Congress. Thus far the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce is the only body of this character which has considered the patent situation at all; and its admirable, critical analysis of the obnoxious Oldfield Bill, and report on the patent system of the United States generally, is much to be commended. The question has been up to Congress so often, and in so many forms, that it is obvious that both House and Senate are indifferent; and that extraordinary pressure must be brought to bear if relief is ever to be attained.

Patent No. 1,068,747 to Charles Dupis, of Charenton, France. This invention relates to kinematographic films which consist in a strong paper band provided with lateral feeding perforations and with axial openings, and in transparent positive images, obtained, for instance, by photography on gelatin, which fill these openings in such a manner that the thickness of the film is uniform at all points. This combination of opaque paper and transparent gelatin provides a band for animated projections which is economical and practically fireproof, and which combines the advantages of paper as regards strength, flexibility and preservation of the dimensions with those of the gelatin as photographical substratum and for transparency. Fig. 1 is an enlarged top view of a band constructed in accordance with this invention; Fig. 2 is a transverse sectional view on the plane 2-2, Fig. 1. a is the layer of images; b designates the strong paper band; c the feeding perforations, and d the openings filled with gelatin d^1, for strengthening the layer a. Reference to the specification is desirable for a clear understanding of details of the process of manufacture, the article claimed being a kinematographic film, which presents transparent images and is provided with feeding perforations, consisting in a band of strong paper provided with openings and in photographs on gelatin, filling said openings in such a manner that the film is of uniform thickness in all its parts; the feeding perforations being cut upon the edges of the paper in operative relation to the images. It is to be noted that a band for projections, according to this invention, will facilitate the realization of colored and stereoscopic projections, as the thinness of the membrane of images allows of superposing several such membranes and obtaining a band still flexible and thin. Said colored photographic pictures on colorless background will be preferably obtained by hydrotype.

Consul General James A. Smith, at Genoa, reports that the Italian Government has planned a stricter supervision of motion pictures in Italy and levying a tax on cinematographic productions. A bill has recently been introduced in the Italian Chamber of Deputies by the Minister of Finance providing for a tax of 10 centesimi ($0.0193) per linear meter (3.28 feet) of film (imported as well as that of domestic production). The bill also provides for a censorship of motion pictures which are to be produced in Italy, prohibiting films portraying pictures distasteful or contrary to public decency and morality, especially those reproducing scenes of cruelty, etc., or which might be an incentive to crime. The establishment of this censorship in all Italy will no doubt necessitate the purchase of a large number of motion-picture machines by the public authorities for censoring films, and presents a possible trade opportunity for American manufacturers of motion-picture machines. For information in this respect la Direzione Generale della Pubblica Sicurezza, Rome, Italy, should be addressed.

The accompanying perspective view, partly in section, represents a camera of the packet folding type, invented by Joseph Goddard, of Rochester, N. Y., who assigns the patent, No. 1,068,889, to the Seneca Camera Manufacturing Co., of that city. The primary object of the invention is to provide a simple and improved camera of this type, whereby the loading and unloading thereof may be accomplished with the greatest facility, the camera having a casing provided with a back formed in sections, which are hinged respectively at the opposite ends of the casing and overlap or form a light tight joint in the center of the back, at which point the back sections may be provided with a catch for retaining them in closed position, the back sections, when opened, affording free access to the film compartments, as well as the film passageway across the back of the camera, and connecting the film compartments. The back sections of the casing are also flanged to seat in complemental grooves formed in the casing to effect a light seal between these parts, and the flanged casing sections co-operate with shiftable spool-centering and retaining members whereby such members are locked in operative position when the back sections of the casing are closed. The principal claim is for the combination of a casing having spool compartments at opposite ends thereof and an exposing chamber between said compartments, and a pair of closure sections hinged to the casing at points adjacent to the respective compartments and serving to uncover and to close said compartments and the exposing chamber of the casing.

The Cameragraph Company, of Kansas City, Mo., has applied for registration of "THE CAMERAGRAPH" as a trade-mark for apparatus for exposing and developing prints, claiming use since August 1st, 1909.

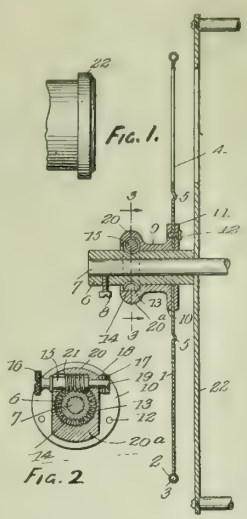
The Societe Francaise des Films et Cinematographs Eclair, of New York, N. Y., has been granted registration No. 62,230 for a trade-mark for moving picture films, the same consisting of the representation of winged figure with trumpet and laurel wreath, used since May 1st, 1912.

JAN 9. 1854
ASTOR LIBRARY OPENED.

Perhaps our readers are not aware that the full text, illustrations, etc., of all of the patents and trade-marks cited herein from time to time are accessible, under certain restrictions, in the Patent Department of the Public Library, which department contains also copies of most foreign patents, particularly those of England, France, Germany, etc. This Public Library Patent Department is a continuation of that fostered by the archaic Astor Library, before its consolidation with the Lenox and Tilden Libraries; and, unfortunately, it also inherits and continues the exclusive, domineering policy there inaugurated over books donated primarily and specifically for the benefit and free use of inventors, patentees and others interested in the arts and industries. That is to say, that while the public has access to the main library and reading rooms until 10 p. m. daily, the Patent Department is closed at 6 p. m., depriving inventors, attorneys and others of the evening hours, the time most available and convenient for ordinary research and investigation. This is a hardship that ought to be remedied, but even this condition of affairs is an improvement as compared with the past, as witness particularly the above conception of the artist, "Chip," of beloved memory.

Truly these be previous and strenuous times. The Panama-Pacific Exposition will be the first world's exposition ever held to commemorate a contemporaneous event—which is going some. At this rate, how long will it be before we are celebrating events in posse? Surely, cinematography is capable of taking time by the forelock and demonstrating the fact that "coming events cast their shadows before." Why not? It has already rendered visually obvious the impossible. Furthermore, why should the "sun" erupt exultantly because Mars zigzagged around the North Pole in less than 36 days, when anyone can cover the same route by cinematograph in less than 30 minutes, and at considerably less trouble and expense?

A simple, easily operated device for adjusting the shutter, which may be applied to existing moving-picture machines, is shown in vertical and transverse section in the accompanying views, in which the shutter, 1, is in the form of a disk having its edge beaded at 2, and a reinforcing wire, 3, is inserted in the bead. The disk is provided with three equidistant segmental openings, 4, and is annualarly grooved to form a rib, 5, on the inner face. The outer edges of the openings, 4, are very close to the bead, 2, and the inner edges are close to the rib, 5. The disk is mounted on a sleeve, 6, secured on shaft, 7, by a set screw, 8. The disk is held on the sleeve by means of collar, 9. A washer, 11, encircles the sleeve, and screws, 12, are passed through washer and disk and engage the collar to secure the parts together. The sleeve, 6, is provided with an annular series, 13, of teeth, forming a worm wheel integral with the sleeve, and the collar, 9, is provided with an internal annular groove, 14. A worm shaft, 15, is journaled on the upper side of the sleeve, and transversely thereof, and is provided with a milled head, 16, and the other end of the shaft is reduced, as indicated at 19, and passes through an opening in the collar, and is engaged by a washer, 17, secured by a pin, 18. The collar, 9, is enlarged, as shown at 20 and 20a, and the enlarged portion, 20, is recessed at 21 to receive the worm shaft. It will be evident that the worm shaft, 15, and the worm wheel constitute not only a means for turning the shutter, but also a means for holding it in adjusted position, since it is obvious that the shutter could not be turned without turning the worm wheel. The invention is that of William P. McIlvanie and Wilfred S. Quinby, of Bellingham, Wash., and the patent is No. 1,068,912.



We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

The steady increase of business, some tempting orders for feature scenarios, lured Nell Shipman from the quiet seclusion of her California home to the moving picture metropolis of the world.

Headquarters have been arranged on the seventh floor of the Candler Building, West Forty-second street.

This industrious photoplaywright is working on a series of single-reel scenarios for Lawrance D'Orsay, the English actor, who will have ludicrous adventures on the screen, with militants in England, exciting episodes with the Home Rule faction in Ireland, and thrilling encounters with Texas cowboys, before he succumbs to the allurements of the American heiress.

PEG OF THE POLLY P (Aug. 27).—Peg is the daughter of a canal-boat captain. Her heart is given to young Bill, who assists her father. But, although the captain is satisfied with the match, Peg's ambitious mother has other plans for her daughter and engages her to a fashionable barber in the city. When Bill protests he is discharged and he leaves the canal boat vowing vengeance on the barber. He arrives in the city and going to the barber shop proceeds to pitch into the barber only to find that he has the wrong one, the other fellow having left town to join a party on the Polly P. At the party the barber incurs the displeasure of all the men on account of the tremendous hit he makes with the girls, that is all save Peg, who is distinctly annoyed by his attentions. The climax is reached when the barber in a spirit of jollity offers to shave the captain's whiskers for nothing. The men, egged on by the captain, throw him into the canal. He lands on shore and tells his troubles to the constable, who boards the boat and places the captain under arrest. On the way to the lockup they meet Bill running away from another constable. They join forces and assisted by the captain's wife they put the two constables to rout. Then jumping into the canal boat they start off at full speed. The constables catch up with them but too late, however, for they have passed the stone marking the state boundary and cannot be touched. Peg's mother removes her objection to Bill and the lovers are happily reunited.

THE SOCIAL SECRETARY (Aug. 30).—The Braggs, a family of newly riches, employ Jean Alden as their social secretary She is to introduce them into society and teach them what to do and say. Jean finds the Braggs' household in great disorder. Mr. Braggs is afraid of his servants, and his business secretary, a designing young fellow, is making love to pretty, frivolous Elsie Braggs. The Braggs' son is a weakling addicted to cocktails and cigarettes. He proceeds to fall in love with Jean but she laughs at the idea She takes charge of the house and puts the servants in their places, instructs Mrs. Braggs and tries to influence Elsie into the right direction. Fearing that this very competent young woman will interfere with his game, the secretary tells Mrs. Braggs that Jean is planning to marry her son. The old lady, very indignant, discharges the girl who, very much amused, packs and makes ready to leave the house. On her way through the hall she sees Elsie hurriedly flinging some jewels into a small satchel and surmises what is about to happen. She enters the room and asks Elsie if she is going to elope. Elsie defiantly says, yes, she is. Jean begs and pleads with her to no avail. As a last resource she tells her the story of her own young girlhood when she left a rich home with a man who wanted only her money. Elsie listens but at the close says the man she loves would not be as the man who betrayed and deserted the other girl. Fawcett, tired of waiting at the gate, enters the room. Jean gets between them, he pushes her aside, when she persists he strikes her brutally. With a face filled with triumph, she turns to Elsie and asks her what she thinks of him now. As he faces Elsie she shrinks from him, finally flinging herself into Jean's arms. Seeing that he has lost out, he leaves the house. Elsie tells her parents what she had been about to do and calls Jean her saviour. Filled with gratitude and remorse Mrs. Braggs tells Jean that she may marry her son. But Jean declines. Realizing that she can no longer remain with them she accepts a large check from Mr. Braggs. She returns to her little son, her most important reason for refusing the heir to the Braggs' millions.

TRUE FEATURE

THE DOOM OF DARKNESS (4 Reels).—Professor Thomas Lovelace, a famous surgeon, has overtaxed his eyes through many delicate and difficult operations. His nephew and assistant at the sanatorium, Dr. Earle Lovelace, induces him to have his eyes examined and the oculist tells the professor that he stands in danger of losing his sight. At this moment the Professor's assistants at the sanatorium telephone him that a famous actress has just reached his sanatorium and is in danger of death unless he operates at once. Disregarding the advice of the oculist, the Professor operates again and goes blind. The patient whom he cured learns of his sacrifice, and offers to care for him and he accepts the offer. Later on the woman becomes acquainted with the nephew of the physician and falls in love with him. He returns her affection but they decide to deny themselves for the sake of the blind man. The latter, however, has overheard their confession of love and their self-denial and refuses to stand in the way of their happiness.

THE HIGHER COURAGE (2 Reels).—There are two kinds of courage, the brutal physical courage and the higher courage. Sometimes these are found together, at other times one excludes the other. The gamekeeper's assistant, who plays the lead in this story, is a handsome, fine looking man, but he has all the tenderness of a woman's heart. His duty requires him to control the game preserves of his master. He sees two poachers and wants to take them prisoners. He is in a protected position and even when they take the alarm it would be easy for him to save his life by firing at them, but the thought of shedding blood is unbearable to him and he lets the poachers escape. But consequently, he is taunted as a coward and shunned by everybody in the village. Opportunities, however, come soon to let him show that while he cannot bear the sight of blood, he has the higher kind of courage. At the risk of his own life he descends on a thin rope along a steep precipice for hundreds and hundreds of feet, in order to bring assistance to a woman tourist who had fallen into the depths of a mountain gorge. Later, he sees a tame deer which has escaped from the preserves, and has caught its foot in a tangle of briar. He takes terrible chances in getting to the deer which is away up on a mountain, and he liberates the suffering animal. When his master, who had joined in the general derision at his cowardice, is about to be shot down by two poachers in ambush, the supposed coward rushes upon the poachers just as they are about to fire and throwing up their guns saves his master's life. In a terrible fire he braves the flames and proves himself a hero. Through a mere accident, his brave deeds become known and the coward of yesterday becomes the hero of to-day. He regains the love of his sweetheart who had begun to doubt his courage and the film ends with a very pretty wedding scene.

THE WATER RAT (2 Reels) (Aug. 25).—In the prologue of "The Water Rat" two young collegians, Anthony Markham and Alan Strange, compete for honors as swimmers. The first named is a strange, taciturn personage, while the second is exactly opposite. Both are suitors for the hand of Rosalie Latimer, the daughter of a banker. Alan wins the watch by a head, but Markham comes up afterwards and accuses him of "boring." This starts something, which ends in a nifty fight, and Alan hands Markham one on the jaw. When Markham staggers to his feet he exclaims: "I'll be revenged on you if it takes me all my life."

Two years pass by; Alan has struggled along in the bank, but sees no chance to win the object of his adoration. Markham lives in a lonely house with his only servant, a secluded and mysterious life. His source of income is unknown, but his appearance is good, and he has a position in society. He is likewise an open suitor for the fascinating Rosalie. Lord and Lady Monteagle visit the banker's home, bringing with them diamonds galore. The latter detail is so notable that the Chief of Scotland Yard sends Detective Locksley. Locksley, Alan and Markham are discussing a number of robberies that have occurred in that neighborhood, when Lady Monteagle trails by them and the diamond necklace she wears falls to the floor. The gallant Alan picks it up and returns it to her. Banker Latimer is importuned by his guest to put the diamond necklace into his safe. He delegates this duty to Alan, who carefully takes it and locks it up in the vault at the bank. This fine necklace excites the cupidity of Markham, and he follows his enemy, Alan, and watches him open the vault and put in the jewels. When Alan starts to return, Markham knocks him senseless. He takes the key to the vault from his pocket, opens the door and possesses himself of the necklace, leaving no trace of his identity. Alan is picked up by a member of the constabulary. He is nevertheless placed under arrest. He protests his innocence and is believed by Rosalie, who importunes Locksley to ferret out the real thief and save the man she loves.

Locksley sends for an operative to help him on the case and they finally conclude to center their attention upon Markham's house—a mediaeval looking structure, overgrown with ivy. He has been studying up the habits of the young man and has concluded that "the water rat," despite his good appearance in company, has some associations with these strange and continual crimes. They come across a scarecrow, and the assistant, by donning the rags of the hideous object and hiding his head in the deep, tattered hat, manages to secure a position that gives him a commanding view of the premises.

Locksley observes an athletic figure jump from the water tower into the river and swim away before he can detect who it really is. Next morning the papers report another mysterious robbery of a bungalow twenty miles away, and the detective couples the strange departure of the man from the tower with the new outbreak. The detective visits the mysterious mansion, is well received by the servant, and is asked to wait a few moments, but he grows irritated over the delay, and, looking out of the window, sees the servant making away with a precious package in a boat. His operative, disguised as a scarecrow, sees the some movement with so much suspicion that he takes to the water in pursuit. The man in the boat hits him on the head. He then makes a get-away, and the detective rushes out and restores his unconscious associate. He finds a little package in the canoe that the fleeing one has overlooked, opens it and discovers a magnificent diamond ring that belongs to Lady Monteagle.

Locksley again visits the house of Markham, ascends the winding staircase, and then finds himself dropped into the river below. Fortunately, he is a strong swimmer and gets away. Next time he goes up the stairs more cautiously. He attains the top room of the turret, and, with his associate, enters it. Markham is there gloating over his plunder, but, being quick, he picks up a pair of guns and covers both men. The imperturbable Locksley drops his new monocle and reaches down to lace his shoe. Rising up, he lifts the table and throws it violently against Markham. The latter's aim is so disturbed that he misses both shots; then he hears help coming up the winding stairs and takes a header from the window into the river below. But this is his last dive—the dive of death. Mistaking distances in the slight depths of the shallow water, he strikes a stone and dashes out his brains. Alan is relieved from the dreadful stigma as Rosalie clasps her arms about him and coos: "My hero!"

THE TENDERFOOT HERO (Aug. 23).—Tom Milford who is foreman of the Hayden ranch and Sylvia Hayden, daughter of the ranch owner are in love. Hayden has been notified that Archie Hollister, son of an old friend in the East, is coming to visit the ranch owner, are in love. Hayden has cowboy brings word to the ranch that Simms, a troublesome neighbor, has been illegally interfering with the ranch supply of water. much amusement. Later it develops that Simms is engaged in selling ammunition across the border to Mexican revolutionists. He learns that the authorities suspect him and thinking to divert suspicion from himself and at the same time get revenge on Milford he conceals a box of ammunition in Milford's bunk house and sends an anonymous letter to the sheriff suggesting that a search of the bunk house will disclose important evidence. The scheme works and Milford is taken into custody when the ammunition is found in his quarters. Before things have gone very far Hollister, whom the cowboys have been joking and hazing, discovers that Simms is the real culprit and, after an exciting adventure with him, causes his arrest, reunites the lovers and himself becomes the hero of the ranch.

HIS STOMACH AND HIS HEART (Aug. 14).—Mr. Weighty is an epicure whose tastes are somewhat difficult to please. An excellent cook is the apple of his eye. Having been invited to dinner at the Graysons, he does ample justice to an excellent repast—and forms such a high opinion of the cooking that he actually desires to thank the cook. This worthy dame, gratified by the unusual compliment, then shows him a certificate which she, Mary Sauce, had received with the first prize in a competition. To the intense disgust of his host he is afterwards discovered in the kitchen bribing the worthy Mary to resign her post with the Graysons and enter his service at an increased salary. The perfidious cook subsequently does so, and Weighty gets all manner of dainty dishes concocted for him. It seems however that she is not destined to remain in his service long, for her fame as a culinary artist has spread about, and the manager of an important restaurant writes to offer her the post of first cook at a salary of $2,000 per annum. The news comes as a shock to Weighty, who for the first time in his life does some hard thinking. He racks his brain to find some means of retaining her services, and comes to the conclusion that by marrying her, he would effect a permanent solution. Alas, "the best laid schemes o' mice an' men gang aft a-gley," as Mr. Weighty finds out the day after his marriage. His wife, in her newly established position, has come to look down on the profession of a cook and has engaged an elementary amateur whose products turn out to be as gall and warmwood to the superfine tastes of Mr. Weighty.

AN EXPLORER'S TRAGEDY (Aug. 19).—This pathetic story concerns a Polar explorer and "the girl he left behind him." The opening scene shows us Morris Parvill's loved ones awaiting news of his return, and their joy when receiving news that he is hurrying home to their fond embraces. Morris at last reaches home, and his sweetheart is happy in the knowledge that the Polar wastes have seen the last of her beloved. But the "wanderlust" again seizes Morris, and when Captain John Hugon makes a special trip to see his lieutenant, bearing with him a letter from the heads of the Geographical Society stating that the Government has placed further funds at their disposal, torn between love of his sweetheart and the Call of the Frozen North, Morris eventually steals away once more.

An interminable period of waiting now ensues. Days, weeks, months, pass slowly by, and Gertrude's heart is breaking with the suspense. Her only consolation is the diary in which she jots down her innermost sacred thoughts.

Next we are shown the expedition. Morris is writing in his pocketbook: "* * * Only three of us now remain. Captain Hugon dying. Sledge lost. Provisions will last two days only and the first food depot is 120 miles to the South. Fierce blizzard. Those who are dear to me * * *"

And then one evening ill news knocked at the door of the old homestead, a telegram is received, sent by the Navy Minister, "who regrets to inform the Parvill family that a part of the Captain Hugon Expedition has perished sixty miles from the Pole. The body of Morris Parvill has been recovered * * *" But we must draw a veil over the sufferings of the bereaved ones. It is only such as they who can realize the suspense, the anguish, the heart-breakings, involved in Polar exploration.

AMERICAN

WHILE THERE'S LIFE (Sept. 1).—Rose had hoped to marry Brill and hers was the true love, but the sister became Mrs. J. Brill and Rose made the entry in her diary, then fell into a restless sleep.

Six months of marriage found Mrs. Brill seeking some other attractions besides the hearth and she resumed her music, while the husband as a chemist was busy in research.

A friend, "Drummer" thought he saw a business opportunity for himself in Mrs. Brill's ability and gave her all the assistance and encouragement he could, which caused the wife to forget her husband's existence. This preyed so on his mind that he became forgetful and as the wife was leaving one evening against his wishes, he made an error which caused an explosion and resulted in his blindness.

The wife was so far advanced as to make public appearances professionally, and in her selfishness, she killed her husband's chance of recovery at the critical moment, but this did not matter when a big offer to tour was made her, and she accepted, leaving and probably breaking her marriage ties forever, which gave Rose, whose attention and devotion to the husband had been constant, every reason to feel that for herself—while there's life—she had every reason to hope.

THE POISONED CHOP (Sept. 4).—Mr. and Mrs. Green are a young married couple with one child, a boy of three. Mrs. Green is given a beautiful collie dog as a present by her brother. She becomes devoted to the animal and, in her husband's opinion, neglects the child.

Enraged at his wife's conduct, Green determines to get rid of the dog at all costs.

He first tries to lose the collie, but it finds its way home, and the same thing happened when he gives it away to a friend. Finally he decides on poison and administers the fatal dose on a tempting mutton chop which he takes from the kitchen of his own house. The poisoned cutlet is placed in a dish and laid in the outhouse where the collie is sleeping.

A tramp steals the poisoned meat from the dog's plate and puts a bare bone in its place. Afterwards, not liking the odor and appearance of the meat, he changes it for another cutlet which he steals from a dish in the Green's kitchen when the cook's back is turned.

A gardener's boy, who happens to look through the outhouse window, sees everything that takes place.

Mrs. Green goes out walking and bids the maidservant take care of the little child during her absence. The maid, not wishing to be troubled with the boy, puts him in the outhouse with the dog. The child plays with the dog and shares its food.

On his wife's return, Green inquires for the child. Mrs. Green questions the servant and is told that he is in the outhouse. On hearing this, Green is overcome with horror. He confesses everything to his wife and shows her the packet of rat poison with which he has attempted to kill the dog. Believing that her child is poisoned, Mrs. Green is in despair; carries the child into the house and summons a doctor.

The gardener's boy, meanwhile, tells Green how he has seen the tramp steal the poisoned cutlet. Green at first is overjoyed to learn of the child's safety but quickly remembers that the life of the tramp is now in danger. Fearing to be guilty of murder, he starts off in search of the man. The boy and the dog follow him, and, before long, a policeman joins in the quest.

The tramp, after walking for some distance, sits down by the side of the road to enjoy his stolen meal. He has just finished the cutlet when Green rushes up and snatches the bone from his hand. Green then explains what has happened, and, to his horror, hears that the poisoned cutlet has been returned to his own kitchen.

He rushes away frantically in the direction of home.

Mrs. Green and the doctor watch the child anxiously but are at last satisfied that he is safe. The doctor takes his departure and Mrs. Green orders dinner to be served at once.

The cook fries the dish of cutlets and they are placed upon the table before Mrs. Green. She is about to begin to eat when the door of the room is opened and Green rushes in. He has heard from the cook of his wife's danger and arrives just in time to snatch the dish from the table.

Everything is now explained and forgiven. The husband and wife embrace each other and their child, while the dog also is petted and caressed. The tramp is rewarded by a liberal supply of rations, a cold bottle and a box of cigars.

THE CALL (Special Feature in Two Parts) (Aug. 30).—Lucile has married Ed Wilson but still continues to receive visits from Tom Hughes, a former suitor and friend of her husband, who works in the same office with him. Tom generally announces his arrival by a yodeling call outside the house and is always given an enthusiastic welcome by both husband and wife.

Estrangement results between Ed and Lucile when she sees Tom getting along in the office better than her husband. Ed becomes discouraged and takes to drink, and is finally discharged from the office. Tom suggests to him that the right thing to do would be for him to drop out of Lucile's life and give her a chance for happiness with another man.

Late one night, Ed leaves the house and starts for the West. Chance, in the form of a railroad accident, favors him and he is able to lose his identity by changing clothes and papers with an unrecognizable victim. Tom identifies the papers and the dead man is buried as Ed Wilson.

Two years later Lucile marries Tom. Ed, meanwhile, has assumed the name of "Bill Stanton," and is making good as a forester in the great Northwest. Within a few years he becomes enormously wealthy and one day, by chance, he meets a clerk from his former office. He hears of Lucile's marriage to Tom and is told also that Tom had so neglected and ill-treated her that she had died, suspicion pointing to Tom as her murderer, though nothing could be proven against him.

Ed resolves to be revenged on Tom and starts toward the city, sending word that he is coming. His letters become more and more frequent until the thirteenth announces that he is in the city. By means of the call which Tom has formerly used when calling at his house, Ed reduces Tom to a state of absolute terror. He finally enters Tom's house and the final act of his vengeance is accomplished. In the struggle between the two men Ed is shot and dies a few moments after his victim.

JOYCE OF THE NORTH WOODS (In Two Parts) (Aug. 29).—John Dale sacrificed his good name, his liberty and the girl he loved to save his younger brother Philip from disgrace. Philip, not man enough to refuse the noble sacrifice, married Ruth Cranston, the girl his brother had loved, and became a wealthy and respected citizen during the five years John was in State Prison.

John, released from jail, assumed the name of Gaston and, plunging into the Maine woods, began his life anew. With illusions, faith, love—everything shattered and ruined—the friendship which he formed with Joyce Birkdale was far removed from anything approaching the sentimental. His feeling for her was rather that of a father than a lover. He worshiped her glowing youth and innocence with the same abstraction of motive with which he worshiped the spring winds or the rising sun.

To Jude Lanzoon, Joyce's accepted suitor, however, the platonic nature of Gaston's attitude was by no means apparent. He fiercely resented Gaston's familiarity with his affianced bride, and bitterly upbraided Joyce for allowing it.

After their marriage the situation did not improve. Gaston accompanying Jude to his home one day, grew a little too warm in his sympathy for Joyce while the husband supposedly slept. Jude waited until Gaston left and then fiercely charged his wife with infidelity, and striking her across the face, drove her from his door. Joyce fled to Gaston for protection, while Jude attempted to arouse the resentment of the woodsmen against the man he claimed had ruined his home. Realizing that his affection had changed to love, Gaston left Joyce and plunged into the words.

Gaston's old sweetheart Ruth, widowed by Philip Dale's death, coming into the woods with her aunt and brother met Joyce. Joyce, recognizing her place in Gaston's life from a photograph she had found, and thinking that Gaston must still love Ruth, prepared to leave them together. At this point she received a letter telling her that Gaston was seriously hurt, actually a trick on the part of Jude to lure her into the woods. Jude's stratagem was foiled by the death of its instigator, and the widowed Joyce, meeting Gaston in the woods, learned that she was the only girl he had ever really loved. This was splendid news to Jock Filmer, Gaston's friend, who adored Ruth, and things ended in a very satisfactory manner for everybody concerned.

A TIMELY REMINDER (Sept. 5).—James Grant paints a portrait of his child upon her deathbed. Time goes on and he foolishly gives way to dissipated habits which cause him to neglect his devoted wife. One night, while enjoying himself with his friends he desires to show them a portrait he has painted of a lady to whom he has been paying undue attention. He writes a note to his wife and sends a servant home to fetch it. The wife substitutes the portrait of her dead child and thus recalls her husband to his better self in a pathetic and effective manner.

POWERS

THE REINCARNATION OF A SOUL (Sept. 5).—Edwin August presents a psychological study in eight episodes dealing with the gradual development of inherent thieving proclivities in a child until the age of manhood. The parents see the tendency but are unable to cope with it and finally, believing the son to be deliberately criminal, the father expels him from the house. The son's decline is rapid and results in a term in jail from which he emerges a typical jail bird, the consort of pickpockets and yeggmen. At times there are flashes of his better instinct striving to overcome his weakness but these become fewer and fewer as he passes down the social scale.

At the time when things seem darkest he is in his hovel looking out into a heavy electrical storm. A flash of lightning strikes and at the same moment his soul is reincarnated. When he rises he marvels at his condition but is unable to explain it. Wandering out upon the street he enters an art gallery. It is students' day and he strolls through looking at the paintings. He comes upon a girl copying a painting that vaguely recalls something familiar. The girl is his former sweetheart but he does not recognize her. He watches her work and finally, impelled by something within, he takes the brush from her and with a few well directed strokes turns the work into a masterpiece. She asks an explanation and he tells her that he himself painted the original. She explains the original was painted over two hundred years before but he still insists. Struck by his sincerity she attempts to solve the mystery and later finds the explanation in a treatise on reincarnation. The thief has been conquered by the soul of the artist. They are married and later a reconciliation with his parents is effected.

THE TALE OF A FISH (Sept. 1).—Ferdie and Bertie are persistent suitors for the hand of Ethel, who loves Jack, who, absorbed in his books, pays but little heed to her. The other two suitors are loved by two charming girls but ignore them. Ethel, not knowing which to select, offers her hand as a prize for a fishing contest, the winner to marry her. Ferdie and Bertie are at once on the job but are annoyed by their other sweethearts and catch no fish. Jack forgets about the contest until roused by Ethel and then falls asleep while angling. The other boys in despair then secretly buy each an enormous fish from a small village lad. Ethel, seeing the wonderful fish they have caught and realizing that either may win her hand, secretly buys an enormous fish from the boy and attaches it to the hook of sleeping Jack and steals away. Bertie is at the hotel and as he displays the wonderful fish he is the hero of the hour when Ferdie comes in with a still larger fish, in fact, a young whale, and is about to claim Ethel's hand when Jack dashes in with a fish of gigantic proportions and claims the girl, much to the amusement of the small boy who discreetly maintains silence.

Father gives his consent to the marriage and scheming Ferdie and Bertie slink away thoroughly discomfited.

"THE PURSUIT OF JANE" (Sept. 4).—At a fashionable summer resort, life has become a dull bore to all the guests except Violet and Daisy Meredith, two young sisters who are being sought after by Sir Algernon Coldstream and Henri St. Ives. Mr. Smith, of New York, a purely American product, finds himself neglected by the younger feminine contingent and becomes the prey of some elderly ladies. This period of calm is broken by the sudden and unheralded advent of Mrs. Jane Garner, a young dashing widow, who finds that through an error no rooms have been reserved for her occupancy. Mr. Smith, Sir Algy and St. Ives, stricken almost to paralysis by her charms, desert everyone else and beg for the privilege of giving up their rooms to the widow. Coins are tossed and Smith wins the privilege of sleeping on the billiard table and resigning his suite of rooms to the adorable Jane.

As the days pass, Violet and Daisy find themselves deserted and a stern race is on between the American and Sir Algy and St. Ives for the widow's hand. The rivals are watchful and give each other no opportunity to be alone with Jane for even a moment.

At last the girls, tearful at being so deserted, appeal to the widow to be merciful and choose one of the three and be done with it and give them a chance at the others.

Jane, really weary of the collective attentions of the trio, determines to be alone for one afternoon at least and hires a boat to row out to the sunset rocks and enjoy a little solitude until the late evening, when the tide coming in covers the rocks. She finds that the boatman has only two rowboats left after renting her own, and realizing that she will be pursued by the rivals, she bribes the boatman to bore holes in the bottoms of the boats. After she has landed on the rocks, her fears are verified, for Sir Algy and St. Ives rent the remaining boats, and give Smith of New York the laugh as they start for the rock. They agree that the first man to reach Sunset Rock shall be left alone with the widow and make a brave start, jeering at Smith, who has got into a bathing suit with the intention of making the rock by a mile swim.

Algy and St. Ives soon outdistance him, but later their boats begin to fill up and finally, waterlogged, capsize and Smith, at first swimming hopelessly behind, forges ahead and leaves them sitting, soaked to the skin, on their overturned boats, from which they are rescued by Violet and Daisy, who, donning bathing suits, swim their ex-suitors to the shore and safety.

Smith, arriving at the rock, finds the widow asleep and determines to put her in a position where she will be at his mercy. He raises the anchor of the boat and getting in it calmly awaits her awakening. She, about to return to the mainland, finds her boat gone and in the possession of the imperturbable Smith, who demands her hand in marriage as the price of taking her off the rock. Although she has grown to care for him, the widow refuses to be driven and says "No" with emphasis, and Smith, nothing daunted, waits for the tide to rise. As the moon comes up, the widow is standing submerged to her knees on top of the now tide covered rock, but though in tears still defiantly gives "Nay" to his pleas. He relents and takes her into the boat and just to be properly femininely inconsistent she then consents, and, a bedraggled pair, they return to the hotel to receive the congratulations of the guests and learn that Sir Algy and St. Ives have returned to their first loves, Violet and Daisy, in a properly humbled and repentant spirit.

THE EVIL POWER (2 Reels) (Sept. 4).—Dr. Kaishian, an adept at hypnotism, uses his occult powers for the gratification of his voluptuous cravings. One day he visits a department store and there meets a beautiful young saleswoman, whom he fascinates by his overpowering personality. Unable to resist his magnetic eyes, Nora becomes a willing slave, and is duly ensconced in his home. Here she is soon disillusioned, but the Oriental servant, Nagen, prevents her from escaping.

Dr. Kaishian in the park, observes a beautiful woman, walking with her husband, William Armstrong. Contriving a ruse whereby he can scrape an acquaintance, he brushes rudely into the couple, and in profuse apology, tenders his card. When the Armstrongs return home, they find one of their children ill, and their regular physician being out on a call, they think of their chance acquaintance Dr. Kaishian, who is summoned.

The wily doctor loses no time to enmesh Mrs. Armstrong, and before he leaves he has reduced her to a state of servility by the exercise of his hypnotic talents. He compels her to follow him, immediately, from the house. She attempts to write a letter to her husband stating that she is going against her will, and just has time to blot it, when the hypnotist tears it up, and forces her to inscribe another, stating that she is leaving voluntarily, and that he will never see her again.

The distracted husband is told by the maid that she suspects Dr. Kaishian is at the bottom of his wife's elopment, and Armstrong rushes to the home of the doctor, and that oily individual professes deep solicitude. He exacts an apology from the husband, even while the wife sits in a hypnotic state behind the curtains in the same room. Nora, burning with anxiety to expose the evil doctor, is ruthlessly seized by the Hindoo servant, who bears her away. When Armstrong leaves, the doctor hastens to the room where Nagon has concealed Nora and orders him to place her in a dry cistern, and drown her by turning a flooding device. While the Oriental is manipulating the mechanism, the girl seizes the opportunity to wrest from him the iron lever, and deals him a terrific blow upon the head, and escapes, while the water wells up and makes him suffer the fate he had intended for her. Upon Armstrong's return from his futile quest the maid rushes forward with additional evidence that the wife is a prisoner in the doctor's house. This is furnished by the blotter she used when she wrote the first message that the doctor tore up. This time he determines to succeed.

The Armenian is prepared for the terrific encounter that ensues. Through the rooms the wrathful Armstrong and the now terrified hypnotist battle, until he reaches where he has a gun concealed. He stands in front of a curtain, and just as he is about to fire at Armstrong, Nora, who is on the opposite side, plunges a stiletto into his side, and he falls agonizedly endeavoring to solve the mystery of his death, while his shot goes wild.

Armstrong recognizes his wife's scream, locates her, and is again happy with her and her children. The police come and discover the evil doctor's body, but not before Nora is far from the house of iniquity.

CRYSTAL

LOST IN THE NIGHT (Sept. 7).—Dick Halstead, a jewelry salesman, is sent to deliver a necklace worth $6,200 to a Mrs. Collingwood, a neighbor of his friends, the Barrys. Tom Barry and his young wife invite Dick to spend a night at their house. As he had to deliver the necklace to his wealthy patron the following day, he accepts. He shows the necklace to Tom and Pearl and they are fascinated by its beauty. They lock it in their safe, the combination of which is known only to Tom and his wife. They retire. Mrs. Barry, who is addicted to the sleep-walking habit, although this is unknown to her husband, gets up in the middle of the night, opens the safe, takes out the jewels, and relocks the safe. She then wanders around the house and finally goes out into the garden, where she hides the necklace in the hollow trunk of an old tree. She returns to bed. The next morning they come down to breakfast, and, Dick being ready to leave, they all go upstairs and Tom opens the safe. To their consternation, they find the jewels gone. Dick, nearly frantic with despair, does not know what to do, and Tom and his wife are at a loss to know how to account for the mysterious disappearance, inasmuch as they were the only two who knew the combination to the safe. The strange part of it all was that no other article of value in the safe had been touched. Tom insists that he is responsible to Dick for the loss, as it happened in his house, and immediately mortgages his home to make good Dick's loss, and thus saving his position. Mrs. Barry is nearly heartbroken, and when the detectives gave up all hope of ever finding the thief her sorrows were enhanced. A year passed and during that interval, almost every night Mrs. Barry, working under the influences of the subconscious mind was wont to arise and go to the hiding place of the jewels and try them on. The mortgage on the home is due and is about to be foreclosed for non-payment, when one night Pearl being ill, Tom goes out to get some medicine for her. She falls asleep and as usual goes out and gets the necklace. When he returns she is holding it in her hand, though it can be seen that she is fast asleep. He cries out in his astonishment and accuses her of being a thief, but only succeeds in awaking her, and then realizing that she had done all this in her sleep, he takes her in his arms and readily forgives her failing as her finding the necklace enabled them to place Dick absolutely right with his firm, and their money being returned to them, the mortgage was not foreclosed and their home saved.

ECLAIR

STEEL (2 Reels) (Sept. 3).—Martin Van Buren (the steel magnate) introduces the Count de Fourviers to his daughter Nancy in hopes that she will marry a title. Nancy finds the French nobleman amusing, but her heart and soul are bound up in her father's technical expert, Gannett Roberts, a splendid American, who is working to perfect a formula of his which will revolutionize the steel industry by producing a metal as resistant as steel, but of only half its weight. Robert feels that if he can only amass a fortune, he may be able to win Nancy's hand.

Success crowns his efforts, and he submits his precious new metal to a stringent test under the direction of the naval authorities. Van Buren, realizing the tremendous value of Robert's formula, invites him to the house and asks him to name his own price—within reason. Roberts loses his head and blurts out that he wants nothing but Miss Nancy, for she would be all in all to him. The magnate sneers at the inventor's presumption, and seeing Nancy with the Count at the end of his spacious halls, points towards them and tells Roberts that she is not for such as he, but has been nurtured to grace the family tree of France's most aristocratic family, the Fourvierses. Roberts takes her engagement to the Count for granted and leaves dejectedly.

Van Buren quickly gets into communication with Luigi, an unscrupulous employee of his, and tells him the formula must be obtained from Roberts regardless of ways or means. Accordingly, Luigi arranges to have two pals of his trip up Roberts, with whom he has scraped an acquaintance. When the tripping occurs, Luigi deftly "frisks" Roberts' billfold, which contains the valuable formula. They part shortly after. Roberts suddenly becomes suspicious of the glib stranger and searches his pockets. Upon discovering that his billfold is missing, he follows Luigi and reaches his door just as the thug motors off to Van Buren's mills. Roberts and his assistant, Cherry (whom he had fortunately met with), cling to the rear of the machine, but its careenings throw them off when they have almost reached the end of the trip. Leaving the injured Cherry on a rock, Roberts overtakes Luigi just as he has concealed the billfold under a secret trap in the cellar of the mills, in accordance with Van Buren's instructions. Luigi refuses to return the stolen billfold or to reveal its whereabouts. They engage in a struggle, and Roberts is almost overcome, when Cherry, who has limped to the mills, enters on the scene with a revolver and holds off the ferocious Italian. Then Roberts and Cherry bind Luigi to a stone post and leave him with the cheerful information that the gunpowder fuse they light near him will blow him and the mills to atoms in an hour, unless Van Buren will allow him to give up the formula.

Roberts forces Luigi's chauffeur to drive him to a doctor's, where he leaves young Cherry, and then to the Van Buren mansion. Although it is late, he forces the butler to call his master. But Nancy meets the butler on his way to her father, and, learning that Roberts is downstairs, hurries to find out what brought him there at that hour. With bloodshot eyes and hot breath he jerkily tells her of the theft of his precious formula—the work of a lifetime—by her father's hirelings, and that very shortly the powder mills in which Luigi is bound will blow up unless her father will restore the formula to him. She sees that he is maddened at his loss, and soothes him by telling him how much she loves him; that she will straighten everything out for him if he will only drive back as fast as he can and save the mills and the man.

Nancy almost drags Roberts to the machine, and they begin a breakneck trip against time. Luigi, after struggling against his fetters until the blood flowed at shoulders and wrists, was enabled by superhuman effort to reach the key controlling the secret trap. It flew back with enough force to extinguish the perilously short flue; then he became unconscious from exhaustion. Roberts was relieved at this discovery, when he arrived, and overjoyed to discover his billfold, with the formula intact, where it had been concealed under the trap. He cut Luigi's ropes and released the man.

Walking out in the clear air, he was inspired, by seeing the countryside parson's beacon light glimmering in the distance, to ask Nancy to marry him then and there. She bravely consented, with the stipulation that he must get into communication with her father and get his consent. So they telephone from the parsonage, and the discomfited magnate reluctantly withdrew his objections when Nancy told him she would never become a countess and had the formula he wanted, anyway. So they were married and, as the old fairy tales have it, presumably lived happily ever after.

VICTOR

THE LOST COPPERHEAD (Sept. 5).—Prof. Robert Markham, a noted bacteriologist, has a wife whose tender heart will not allow her to see cruelty shown to helpless animals, and when her husband, in spite of her protests, persists in the practice of vivisection, she leaves him and, with her baby boy, makes a home for herself by dressmaking, vowing she will return only when he promises to discontinue his obnoxious experiments.

Years roll by and the wife, stifling the yearnings of her heart, keeps her vow. The professor in his work finds himself in need of a toxin extracted from the deadly copperhead snake. He writes to a friend in the West, who sends him the reptile by parcel post. The letter carrier, in making his rounds, absentmindedly leaves the box containing the snake on a chair at a fruit-stand, where it is found by the professor's little son and a girl playmate, who have come there to buy candy. They take the box to their front stoop and proceed to open it. It is tied very tightly, however, and they have some difficulty in untying the cord. The mailman in the meanwhile has delivered the letter telling of the snake's arrival, and on the professor asking him for the box, remembers his carelessness. He tells the professor, who immediately telephones the police, who, on their arrival at the professor's house, and learning the facts, rush out in search of it.

On coming to the fruit-stand, the Italian tells them of the little boy and girl who took it away. He points out the direction they took on leaving, and the professor, mailman, and police start after them at top speed. Passing a saloon, some quarreling toughs delay the police for a few moments. The letter carrier, however, rushes on until he stumbles over a dirtheap and strains his knee. A passing bicyclist, hearing his story, loans him his wheel, and the chase is on again. The children have by this time removed the cord, and are just about to raise the fatal lid when the mailman rides up, snatches the box from them, and flings the accursed thing to the middle of the street, where, happily, an automobile crushes out the venomous life.

The professor and the police, having quieted the quarreling toughs, now arrive, and the former, overjoyed at the escape of the children, gives the girl a dollar bill and offers the same to the boy, who refuses, saying that his mother would not allow him to take money from a stranger. The professor asks to be taken to the mother, and, on seeing her, recognizes his long-lost wife. He begs her to come back home with him, which she does after he promises her that he will never again experiment on helpless animals.

FRONTIER

FLIRTY FLORENCE (Sept. 4).—The lives of some people connected with circuses and carnivals, it is known, have (at times) been considered a bit sandy. Our story deals with "Flirty Florence," the wife of Jim Baker, who is with a carnival company. Business had been none too brisk, and it was necessary to resort to some measures to get sufficient money to carry the project along.

Jim decided that Florence must try her wiles on the wealthy young lawyer, Horace Bradley by name, a successful practitioner in the town that they were then working. She fixes herself up as fascinating as possible and succeeds in interesting Bradley to the extent that he agrees to go with her the following day to the carnival and look over the grounds, as Flirty Florence has informed him that she had money to invest and the carnival business appealed to her. The next day Miss Frost, an eccentric old maid, finding it impossible to use three opera tickets herself, brings them to the Bradley home just as Mr. Bradley is leaving for the office to keep his engagement with Florence. The mother-in-law can see no reason why he can't accompany them to the opera; his excuse that he has an engagement at two, and that he can't break it, isn't satisfying to her. Mrs. Bradley, the loving little wife, is satisfied that her husband is honest in the extreme, and she kisses him good-bye, believing implicitly in him.

We next see Flirty Florence and Bradley come from his office building, get into an automobile and ride away. Next we see them riding in the auto; Flirty Florence is gradually but surely winning him over and Bradley is completely absorbed in Florence. The automobile which carries Miss Frost comes into view close up to them; she sees Bradley with a strange woman and is greatly shocked, and decides to follow them. We next see the automobile containing Florence and Bradley draw un to the curb; they alight and go into the carnival grounds. The auto with Miss Frost comes into view; she sees them and decides it is her duty to tell the wife, and goes off with that intention in view. She arrives at the Bradley home just as the wife and mother are starting for the opera. She induces them to get into her automobile, telling them what she has seen. They start away towards the carnival grounds, the mother and the old maid trying to fire the gentle little wife with a feeling for revenge. They arrive at the carnival grounds and a search for Bradley and Flirty Florence is started.

In the meantime Florence has missed no opportunity to impress Bradley with her charms, while Jim Baker, the husband, has kept very close in the background waiting for his opportunity. The merry-go-round stops; Florence and Bradley get off. Mrs. Bradley, the little wife, comes into view, and sees what she apparently thinks is unfaithfulness on the part of the husband. The demon of jealousy takes full possession of her, and she demands an explanation from him. Florence, seeing the game is up, starts to get away. The wife grabs her, and when the dust clears, the little wife demonstrates her ability as a scrapper, for Florence has received a very good beating. Officers come upon the scene and a general mixup ensues. The wife, realizing now that her husband is in danger of arrest, very cleverly arranges for his escape. She rushes him to the auto and hurries him away. Florence apparently gets her just dues, for she is hurried to the police station. The next morning Mr. Bradley hobbles out onto the lawn, looking as though he had passed through a Texas cyclone, the mother-in-law storming in the background. Mrs. Bradley comes out of the house with the desire to go to her husband, but the mother prevents it.

In the meantime the husband has picked up the morning paper, in which he reads of the arrest of Florence, the most notorious blackmailer known to modern times. He is sufficiently quick-witted to grasp the opportunity. The wife and mother-in-law rush to him; he shows them the article, tells them that he knew her all the time, and was arranging to have her arrested and prosecuted. The mother-in-law is a bit skeptical, but the little wife swallows the story, and the world knows that where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. The ending scene shows Florence locked behind the prison bars, not so very much worried, for apparently it is not the first time, and as justice is satisfied our story should be complete.

NESTOR

THE OATH OF CONCHITA (Two Parts) (Sept. 1).—A story of the Mission-Indian days of sunny California, when sandaled padres, dark-skinned senoritas, and quick, silent Indians moved about the few sparsely scattered missions, is told in "The Oath of Conchita."

The padre feels the call to preach to the wilder tribes and ascends the tortuous trails to the mountain village home of Conchita, where he teaches the Indians kindly ways and good deeds. Conchita, daughter of Pedro, is impressed by padre's earnest teachings, and is prevailed on to accompany him down to the mission to be instructed.

The days pass, and happy hours with Conchita awaken forbidden love in the padre's heart, which he conquers only by the timely arrival of Ricardo, a Spanish grandee, who wooes and wins Conchita and marries her.

But another, El Sombriado, the black one from the mountains, has a life-long love for Conchita, companion of his boyhood days; and having lost her through marriage, he comes down to the mission and slays Ricardo even as the ceremony is concluded. Conchita takes her oath of vengeance and follows El Sombriado to the mountains. She, in turn, is followed by the padre. At the wayside shrine she renews her oath, and the padre, close on her heels, is in the meantime captured by El Sombriado and a few renegade friends.

Conchita discovers the padre a prisoner and releases him, to be followed by El Sombriado and his men. A meeting takes place beneath the wayside shrine and El Sombriado, now maddened by jealousy, attacks Conchita with his knife. Conchita, fresh from the renewal of her oath, meets him knife in hand, and in the struggle that follows El Sombriado falls back against the cross of the shrine. Aged by time and weather, the arc of the cross falls and, striking the "Black One" on the head, ends his life. The padre offers a prayer over the dead Indian, while the others flee in terror, thinking the punishment of El Sombriado divine.

Conchita is returned to her mountain home by the padre, who then seeks solace in the rosary and cell, while Conchita goes back to her father's home, her oath fulfilled.

PATHE FRERES

PATHE'S WEEKLY (Aug. 25).

THE HOSTAGE (Aug. 26).—In this interesting film a physician is captured by Arabs and held as a hostage until the Caid, held by the French soldiers, is released. They threaten to kill the physician if the Caid is not released in three days. While the physician is awaiting death, one of the Chief's daughters is bitten by a snake, and the physician succeeds in curing her. Soon thereafter the physician escapes through the aid of the Chief and his daughter, and on reaching civilization has a vision of his rescuer being in trouble. He secures the release of the Caid from the French authorities and arrives at the Arab camp just in time to rescue his rescuer.

$1,000 REWARD (Aug. 27).—Tom Fitzsimmons is discharged from the ranch where he's a cowboy because he has the nerve to propose to the ranch-owner's daughter. Disheartened, Tom seeks what solace he can find in a nearby booze emporium, and there in a penny dreadful he reads of a holdup. This determines his course, and he goes out to become a bandit. In holding up the stage coach, however, he finds that he is in reality holding up the holdup man, Red Bill, for whom $1,000 reward is offered. He completes his capture, collects his thousand-dollar reward, and, returning to the ranch, dazzles the owner's eyes with his crisp thousand-dollar bill and wins the girl.

THE COOK'S REVENGE (Aug. 28).—Bridget O'Hooligan is in love with Pat Flaherty, the cop on her beat. She is the kitchen lady in Mr. Randolph's house and often entertains Pat, who is a corpulent body. One day, while regaling himself on Mr. Randolph's beer, he is discovered by Randolph and forcibly ejected. Miss O'Hoolihan determines to have revenge, and when Mr. Randolph goes for an auto ride she fills his thermos bottle with coffee strong enough to kill an ordinary man. On the ride the water gives out, and as a last resort the O'Hoolihan brand of coffee is poured into the radiator. The auto promptly goes crazy with nervous indigestion. On his return from his perilous ride Mr. Randolph telephones the police to come and arrest the queen of the kitchen. Imagine his mortification when Bridget's friend, Pat Flaherty, comes to make the arrest and turns the tables on Mr. Randolph.

A DAY WITH A HINDOO FAMILY (Aug. 29). In this beautifully colored Patheplay an intimate and interesting view of Hindoo life is shown. The women do housework while the men feed their cattle. After the house is cleaned, the women, in order to make their homes more hospitable, draw grotesque figures in the soil before their doors. Nearly all of the water is carried by the women; they move in lines like automatons to and from the well.

On the same reel:

THE ROAD TO MORITZ, FRANCE.—This travel picture is beautifully photographed and very interesting. The railroad which winds its way perilously along the mountain by means of extensive and beautiful stone viaducts is a remarkable feat of engineering skill.

On the same reel:

THE VALLEY OF THE BOURNE.—Another colored picture consisting of a series of exquisite views of this beauty spot of France. The Bourne is a tributary of the Isere and rushes over cascades and beautiful waterfalls, a turbulent and beautiful stream.

THE BLIND GIRL OF CASTLE-CUILLE (Aug. 30).—This beautiful Patheplay is adopted from Longfellow's poem by the same name. It tells a story of a beautiful girl, in love with a man and about to marry him. A witch tells her that her lover is false, but she has faith in him. One day, when he brings a rabbit in to eat and hangs his powder horn above the mantelpiece, the girl accidentally knocks the powder horn down and is blinded by the exploding powder. After this her lover goes away, and in the springtime he sees a vision of his former sweetheart with a friend of hers, Baptiste, and he returns to the village and marries Baptiste. As the wedding procession passes the blind girl's house, she asks her brother whose it is, and on learning the identity of the happy couple, follows them to church with the intention of killing her rival. But a vision of an angel appears before her eyes and stays her hand and she falls dead before the altar.

GREAT NORTHERN

THE HYPNOTIST (Aug. 23).—This is an excellent one-reel comedy which is built around a subject never before attempted in moving pictures. The funmaking forces of the Great Northern acting forces are seen at their best and the result is a most enjoyable film comedy. Jack and Jim, according to the story, are in love with the same girl, and each is endeavoring to use all the arts of persuasion to win her over. Jack is stout and jolly and Jim is thin and prides himself upon being an amateur hypnotist. At a house party Jim displays his cleverness to good advantage and succeeds in keeping the guests amused.

This angers Jack, who stoutly maintains that the hypnotic spell is simply a fake and that he defies anyone to place him under the influence. Jim accepts the challenge and proceeds to do the Svengali act with his rival. There is immediate action. The portly Jack is made to believe that he is a gallant soldier, and after being supplied with a military cap and toy musket marches throughout the house in quest of the imaginary enemy. He encounters all sorts of obstacles and manages to overcome them through the medium of demolishing almost everything in sight, although human life is spared. The warfare of the "general" might have gone on for an indefinite period had not Jim been notified of the dilemma. At that precise moment the amateur hypnotist was courting the girl in the story, and at her behest he consents to awaken Jack from his hypnotic spell. The finale is amusing, and, of course, Jack accepts the inevitable when he is told of the depredations he has committed while under the spell of hypnotism. It is an amusing little conceit.

PICTURE MUSIC

Ernst Luz

The Drum and the Picture

I HAVE always refrained from discussing the drum and its musical influence in picture playing, knowing that there was a greatly varied opinion among the exhibitors as well as picture critics. There is no doubt but what many appropriate effects can be obtained by a competent drummer, which assist in the featuring of many pictures, still experience has proven that the work of picture drumming is a very much overworked vocation. In many instances the entire musical program is left to the mercy of the drummer, and he has been taught to take advantage of it, for which he receives much harsh criticism, very often well deserved. A drummer may become overly zealous in his work, feeling that unless he obtain numerous effects his services will not be required, for truly we can not class his results as being musical. The drummer and his various traps are, nevertheless, indispensable in proper musical combinations. Not so very many years ago a piano and drum combination was a musical disgrace, while to-day it is very popular, and appreciated by many. It is hardly probable that people of a more or less refined intellect would at any time patronize a place where the drum was featured. There are so many effects that can be accomplished with a drummer's traps that to enumerate them would take up a great deal of valuable time. In this very fact lies the danger of his very often ridiculous overwork. There is seldom a picture projected wherein there is not some suggestion to which he can put some noise effect, often realistic, more often not so realistic and very often ridiculous. The drummer's real value depends upon what intelligence he can inject into his work, for of what value are any of his effects if he immediately after ruins them by some unnecessary noise? Were the drummer to concentrate upon the pertinent points in the picture, accentuating only that which is of value to the picture story and possible for him to correctly imitate, not burlesque, he would find his endeavors more universally appreciated. To be competent in making imitations, it is first necessary that one should be acquainted with the original. Because a trap is advertised to produce a certain effect or imitation does not necessarily mean that it will do so, for in many cases the sounds produced are nothing like the original and give nothing more than a ridiculous suggestion. Because they often produce a laugh, they are tolerated, no one ever taking the trouble of making a canvass to ascertain as to whether the laugh was one of ridicule or commendation. My experience has conclusively proved to me that in 50 per cent of such instances the audience snickers at the ridiculous endeavor, for those that are not acquainted with the original sound are unmoved. This only applies to the overzealous drummer, who has been taught to believe that the moving picture theatre is destined to be a noise factory, à la "Coney Island." However we may try, we will never be able to deny that the picture's greatest triumph will be realized when it portrays the greatest morals, or well-acted stories, with easily understood clarity in its perfect quiet and wordless style. There can be no doubt but that the picture's novelty depends on its ability to entertain in perfect silence as far as the screen action is concerned. Why we should try to inject ridiculous noises into the work other than those which would add to the musical tone of the theatre is a still unsolved problem to me.

When inteligently worked in connection with a musical program there are many excellent opportunities afforded for the use of numerous traps in a manner that will have a tendency for renewing picture interest. The most important of these may be in explosion or blast effects, for in picture playing such action at all times is a cue for the temperamental change in the music; the sound imitation, which is best accomplished on a tympani, is an assistance in making a segue at such a point, hiding any roughness that may occur in making an abrupt change from one number to another. The more forte such an imitation is made the better, making a decrescendo as the new musical number opens. Train effects when well done at opportune moments are most always appreciated. When some little judgment is used many opportunities will arise when this imitation can be used as a solo. Some time ago several pictures were released in the same week opening or closing with train scenes which afforded excellent opportunities. In these pictures I allowed the drummer to open the picture on the first title with his imitation, breaking in on it by anticipating the end of the scene with my first number. This same solo effect is just as easily accomplished at any other point in the picture, if in laying your music for the picture you use the screen action as a segue cue, allowing your drummer to make the imitation between the two numbers. When making solo work of this action it should be remembered that it can only be effective when the action on the screen is well defined, and not too short, which again has a tendency to make the noise ridiulous. Church bells afford solo opportunities when the action or suggestion is not too long drawn out on the screen. Pistol shots, gongs, doorbells, fire-alarms, door-knobs, telephone, in fact all imitations of that which is inanimate, are very often suggested in the picture, when their use is a great assistance to picture clarity. Anything that excites interest at poines essential to the clarity of the picture plot will be appreciated if nearly well done. I might cite hundreds of pictures wherein imitations have been important factors, still I know that two unnecessary ones are made to every one that is really called for. Bird and animal imitations are usually very crude, often ridiculous, and should be avoided while any good musical number is being rendered, unless it is positively essential to picture clarity. Such imitations give the music a discordant effect and must certainly be very annoying to any one at all musically inclined. The baby cry is possibly the most annoying of the animate effects, seemingly never to tune with any number and is very often unnecessarily overworked. It is seldom that you have a picture wherein the crying baby is necessary to the picture story; more often the director is cursing because it is crying and when such undesired action occurs in sentimental, romantic, pathetic or plaintive scenes, while you are playing appropriate music, the imitation creates a very annoying discord, which is seldom understood by the audience and reacts unfavorably upon the music. In dramatic pictures extreme care should be taken so as not to overwork the imitations, avoiding all the animate imitations not positively necessary to picture clarity, at the same time endeavoring to make the inanimate imitations solo work whenever possible. Many of the imitations can again be humored by the musical number being played, such as horses' hoofs which can always be done in perfect rhythm and tempo to the Western style intermezzo or galop. Boisterous action such as falls, struggles, battles, etc., must always be accompanied by likewise appropriately placed boisterous music, which when properly combined can be made very realistic and exciting, having an annoying effect only when too long drawn out in the picture, when a change to a heavy galop will very often relieve the monotony. There seems to be an insistent cry for all the effects possible in the comedy pictures, there being so many of the near-comedy style released, which virtually cry for help, that I have never given the matter of comedy imitations a serious thought. Basing my views on the fact that during the projection of a comedy picture, no one really cares to be serious or overly critical, it is very probable that whatever humor can be created, ridiculous or otherwise, lightens the mental activities, which is the desired mood for the audience if the picture is to be at all appreciated. In programming such pictures I play the popular music of the street, during which I give the drummer full privilege to go the limit. It is to be hoped that some day all pictures will be properly plotted by the manufacturers before release as to necessary music and trap effects, which will eventually relieve the picture theatre of the very many annoying noise effects.

Through the generosity of George Kleine, the various orphan asylums of Cleveland poured their thousands of homeless waifs into the B. F. Keith Hippodrome one day last week as the guests of Mr. Kleine, to see "Quo Vadis."

OUR MOTTO—ONE FOR ALL, ALL FOR ONE

The last regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 on Monday, August 18, 1913, was attended by 250 members despite the exceedingly warm weather. Regular routine of business was quickly transacted. Meeting closed at 4 a.m.

* * * *

We are sorry to note that death has invaded the homes of two of our brothers. Bro. Samuel Faub lost his infant daughter, 10 weeks old, on Monday, and Bro. George De Angelo had the misfortune to be deprived of his grown sister, nineteen years old, on Thursday of this week. The members of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 extend heartfelt sympathy in the brothers' bereavement.

NOTICE

The next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 will be held on Monday, September 1, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex Street, 12 o'clock, midnight. A full attendance of all members is required.

J. A. LE ROY,
Bus. Representative.

NOVELTY ADVANCE SLIDES

The value of the Advance slide to advertise feature pictures ahead has been recognized by moving picture exhibitors everywhere. Yet, when this method of advertising was introduced by Joseph F. Coufal, the general manager of the Novelty Slide Co., the idea was treated with but little consideration.

At the present time there is not a feature film manufacturer of any importance that does not include the Advance slide as an important part of his publicity matter, and as a consequence the Novelty Slide Company have made arrangements with the leading producers to prepare attractively designed slides for all special feature releases.

Beautifully colored Advance slides, each containing a scene from the feature, a short descriptive matter and space for date, can now be secured for all the multiple reel releases of the General Film Co., Mutual Film Corporation, Universal Film Mfg. Co., Exclusive Features, Warner's Features, and other special films.

The great value of the Advance slide lies in the fact that an exhibitor can advertise his feature directly before his regular audience once every performance, a week or more in advance if he chooses, and at the very small cost of 25c. per slide. Thousands of exhibitors are using Novelty Advance Slides to-day and thousands more will avail themselves of this beneficial advertising medium this fall.

The Kinemacolor Company has closed a contract with Jake Wells, the Southern theatrical magnate, for the permanent installation of the Kinemacolor in the twenty theatres of his circuit. Mr. Wells plans to handle the Kinemacolor productions for the entire South. Atlanta, Birmingham, Savannah, Norfolk, Richmond and other cities on the Wells circuit will begin the new form of entertainment, consisting of a Kinemacolor headliner, followed by an hour of black-and-white feature and miscellaneous subjects. Later on regular road shows will play subsidiary circuits of the smaller Southern cities. Mr. Wells has found the big feature picture shows the most profitable form of entertainment in his popular-priced theatres, and with the Kinemacolor pictures he expects to attract the best class of patrons.

FRED J. BALSHOFER IN NEW YORK

"The wanderer has returned," meaning that the above well-known film man is back in the town of pretty girls and feature films. Mr. Balshofer arrived from Los Angeles, California, on Tuesday, August 19th, where he has been since January of this year, taking full charge of the business, and laboratory end of the Broncho and Kay-Bee studios. He will be in New York for several weeks, looking after various details of the company's business and incidentally getting acquainted again with his friends in and out of the picture business, which are legion.

KLEINE-AMBROSIO PRODUCTION, "LAST DAYS OF POMPEII," IS MASTER WORK, SAYS KLEINE

Mr. George Kleine, who has recently returned from Europe where he watched the production of 'The Last Days of Pompeii" has much to say concerning the splendor of the big eight-reeler which he and E. Stevani jointly own. "The work of Nydia, the blind girl, is the finest bit of pantomime I have ever been allowed to witness," said Mr. Kleine. "I predict an enormous success for her when the film is finally released. The scene in which Vesuvius destroys the city is a rare work. This single scene will last seven minutes before the camera, the longest scene probably in motion pictures. No money has been spared anywhere. You will remember that the story calls for only one lion, who is terrified at the eruption and refuses to kill Glaucus. In the picture, the entire arena is dotted with lions, while 4,000 people look on. Owing to a big strike in the mills near Turin, we were enabled to gather these 4,000 men together, a feat of some importance, you will admit, when you see the film."

R. S. Hanford, business manager of Moving Picture Stories, of New York, has severed his connection with that publication to become advertising manager of The Photoplay Magazine, published in Chicago. Mr. Hanford is an experienced advertising man and has an intimate and thorough knowledge of the moving picture industry. He started Moving Picture Stories for Frank Tousey, Inc., the publishers, last January.

Y., and one Simplex Machine to the same concern; A. C. to D. C. Economizer equipment to E. W. Lanke, new Studio Theatre, Bridgeport, Conn. This A. C. to D. C. Economizer is equipped with the new double lamp attachment which Mr. Hallberg will be pleased to exhibit to any of his customers who may be interested.

Simplex PROJECTORS GIVE PERFECT SCREEN RESULTS AND ARE BUILT TO WEAR

That is why Simplex has been selected by over 90% of the photoplay manufacturers and importers for their own use, Geo Kleine for the projection of that masterpiece Quo Vadis, the head offices in New York of the General Film Co., Mutual Film Corp. and Universal Film Mfg. Co. and the Kinemacolor Co. for the projection of their natural color pictures all over the world.

Kinemacolor pictures are projected at twice the ordinary speed (thirty-two pictures a second). The fact that Simplex has been selected in preference to all other American and European machines for this severe service is proof of its remarkable wearing qualities and perfect projection.

When Simplex machines are insisted upon by such Companies as the above, you are very foolish, Mr. Exhibitor, to use anything else. Follow the lead of the big successful men and you won't go wrong.

ALL STAR COMPLETES "ARIZONA"

Augustus Thomas' Everlasting Success Soon Ready for Screen and Phenomenal Sales Recorded for Territory

Very soon "Arizona" will be with us. Tents have been dismantled and Fort Grant, where a week ago bustle and activity reigned supreme, now presents a scene of desolation. The Canby Ranch, famous in Mr. Thomas' play, has been torn down and the debris cleared away. This ranch house and adjoining buildings formed perhaps the most unique background ever used in a picture subject of the type of "Arizona." No scenery was used in its construction. "Use lumber, lathe and plaster and make every setting realistic," was the order given by Augustus Thomas when he first took command of the production department of the All Star.

The cavalrymen and cowboys have returned to fort and plains and the Broadway stars who enacted the principal parts in "Arizona" are now in rehearsal with the various theatrical productions with whom they held contracts. All the rush and roar of field action is over and America's greatest play has become a human film document to be shown over and over again to men, women and children all over the world.

It is interesting to note the previous successes of this unique Western heart story. Twelve years ago it ran at the Herald Square Theatre for three hundred nights. Chicago supported the show for several months which was a phenomenal record in those days. As many as nine companies were operating in the United States at one time to tremendous receipts.

A special company was sent to London where "Arizona" played at the Adelphi Theatre for three months and then toured the provinces for over four years. During the London run, the King and Queen occupied the royal box on two occasions and paid compliments to several members of the company.

"Arizona" has been played in Australia, South America, Japan, the Philippines, Spain and Portugal. It is now running in many American cities, in fact, New York saw an all-star revival of the piece at the Lyric Theatre which broke all records for summer business at high prices. The Harlem Opera House later duplicated the Lyric success. That the film will be a success goes without saying as it will have all the prestige and reputation of the play to back it up. Besides Augustus Thomas has taken four acts, which the play is limited to, and developed them into two hundred and ten in the picture. He has idealized the play and brought out details of the story which strengthen the picture to a marked degree.

Cyril Scott as "Denton" was an ideal selection for the part. Handsome, with fine military bearing and stage presence yet strong jawed and rugged in appearance and temperament, he is fit realization of the character, in fact Mr. Thomas picked "types" for all the many characters in the big film. Francis Carlisle as Colonel Bonham, Robert Broderick as Canby, Charles Graham as Kellar, Mr. Davenport he realizes the value of all-star productions as an attraction as Tony, Lizzie McCall as Mrs. Canby, Alma Bradley as Lena, H. D. Blakemore as Doctor Fenton, William Conklin as Hodgeman, Gertrude Shipman as Estrella, and charming Gail Kane as "Bonita" are shining examples of his excellent judgment. In fact, a real Chinaman is used to portray the Canby cook. Again, cowboys and cavalrymen used in the film represent the real thing. No stage soldiers or alleged cowpunchers for Augustus Thomas.

Al H. Woods was perhaps the first "outsider" to see portions of the "Arizona" film. Before he left the All Star office President Raver had closed contracts with him for the German Empire at a sum which reaches into five figures. Mr. Woods, besides his large theatrical interests in America, controls upwards of sixty theatres in Germany, and for these houses.

The remaining American territory is going rapidly, according to authentic reports. A large percentage has already been sold, in some cases for the first year's output of the All Star, which includes "Soldiers of Fortune," by Richard Harding Davis, and other big successes.

The All Star Corporation combines the necessary elements for the making of big films. Selwyn and Klein, with the American Play Company and Authors' Producing Company back of them; George Cook, with his lithographing establishment; Augustus Thomas, author, director and man of affairs, and Harry Raver, experienced through hard knocks from the ground up and trained from the theatre, black tent, film exchange, publicity, factory, laboratory, studio and as an importer of films besides holding down responsible official positions in several corporations, this is a quintet not to be lightly considered.

DOOMED TO DIE, OR THE VIAL OF WRATH

Drama in Three Reels. Release September 3rd, by Union Features

"Doomed to Die," presents an absorbing plot, and the tragic climax is the only logical outcome of the story. Dr. William Burton, a middle-aged bacteriologist of considerable fame, marries Annette Verdier, a beautiful girl whose life had been saved by him when she was about to succumb to a dangerous illness. Annette engages in a flirtation with the doctor's friend, John Armand, a neurasthenic. Armand writes a love letter to the indiscreet young wife which is shown to the doctor by his loyal but officious housekeeper.

Meanwhile the doctor has discovered the bacillus of hydrophobia, and when Armand's servant calls for an opiate the doctor is so inflamed at his friend's treachery that he substitutes the deadly hydrophobia bacillus for the opiate with the deliberate purpose of a horrible revenge.

DEATH OF DR. BURTON

Armand grows more and more feverish from day to day. Then as the inevitable end approaches he is established in the doctor's apartments for "better observation and treatment." Thereupon the doctor reveals to him the cause and purpose of his revenge.

Armand finally goes stark mad, and runs about on all fours, gnawing the furniture and barking like a dog. The doctor, to make his revenge complete, pushes his wife into the room with the madman, locks the door and leaves her to her fate. Annette manages to elude the fury of Armand for some time, but he is just about to leap at her throat, when the doctor relents and rushes to her rescue. The madman, turning on the doctor, almost tears him to pieces, and then falls dead at his feet.

Dr. Burton dies from loss of blood, while Annette is weeping at his bedside convulsed with grief in consequence of the double tragedy that her faithless course has brought about.

JOE BRANDT SAILS FOR EUROPE

Joe Brandt, having spread the fame of the Universal program from Maine to California through his novel publicity methods, sailed on Tuesday, August 26th, on the Kaiser Wilhelm II for London, where he will give the Britishers some idea of why the Big U has made itself a power in the American film field.

Mr. Brandt is well equipped for his task, which includes the organization of an English publicity department for the exploitation of the Universal output in Europe, and a sales campaign in co-operation with John Tippett, who has been made general European sales manager for the Universal films. He laid the foundation for his business career by graduating from the University of the State of New York with the degree of LL.B., and was admitted to the bar the same year. From the practice of the law he entered the national advertising field, and for several years was identified prominently with the Hampton Advertising Agency.

As manager of the New York office of the Billboard and advertising manager of the New York Dramatic Mirror, successively, he formed the nucleus of an acquaintance with the film field that secured for him the position of private secretary to Carl Laemmle. When Mr. Laemmle joined his interests with the Universal, Mr. Brandt became advertising manager of that corporation. Later his duties were broadened to include the editorship of the Universal Weekly, and the direction of the entire advertising and publicity interests of the Big U. In this connection he inaugurated a campaign of publicity that covered all of the exhibitors' conventions from one end of the continent to the other. He thus got acquainted with numerous exhibitors, exchangemen, manufacturers and exploiters of films generally, and made it a point to interest them in the Universal program.

A large delegation of friends from the Universal offices and the Screen Club were at the docks of the North German Lloyd to wish Joe bon voyage. Mr. Brandt's successor as head of the publicity department of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company will be George U. Stevenson, who has been associated with him as fellow-editor of the Universal Weekly for the past six months.

KING BAGGOT

King Baggot, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece page this week, is now with the Imp Company in England, where he has been impersonating the title role in "Ivanhoe," the spectacular feature shortly to be released in this country by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Mr. Baggot made his first appearance in motion pictures in 1909 with Florence Lawrence at the Imp studio in New York. This was at the invitation of Harry Saulter, who had played with him in "The Wishing Ring" the previous season. Since then he has played on an average in one picture each week, and has written and appeared in many of his own scenarios produced by the Imp Company.

Born in St. Louis in 1879, young Baggot became apprentice to an electrical contractor at the age of fifteen. At eighteen he entered the real estate business with his father and during the next three years he distinguished himself as a soccer player, playing against such teams as the Thistles of England and the Shamrocks of Canada.

In 1890 he organized the Players' Club of St. Louis and made his debut as an amateur actor. This led to his engagement to play Horatio in "Hamlet" with a professional stock company at Koerner's Garden, St. Louis. After some stock experience in Chicago, he returned to St. Louis, and appeared with the late Lawrence Hanley in Shakespearian productions. Mr. Baggot's first New York engagement was as juvenile lead in "The Queen of the Highway." After that he was engaged by Charles E. Blaney and appeared for several seasons as the matinee idol in "More To Be Pitied Than Scorned," returning to St. Louis each summer to play with the Suburban Stock Company, comprising such stars as James K. Hackett, Virginia Harned, Amelie Bingham, Wilton Lackaye, Maude Fealy and others.

After terminating his engagement with Mr. Blaney, he appeared in a number of Broadway successes such as "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," "Salomy Jane," "The Squaw Man" and "The Bishop's Carriage." His final appearance on the speaking stage was as leading man to Marguerite Clark in "The Wishing Ring."

In addition to being one of the most popular players in the motion picture world, Mr. Baggot is extremely popular in sporting circles. He is an ardent fight fan, and never misses a pugilistic bout that comes anywhere near the vicinity of his local habitation. Mr. Baggot was elected the first president of the Screen Club in 1912, which is additional proof of his popularity with all sorts and conditions of men who move in camera circles.

"The Last Days of Pompeii," by Pasquali, is said to be the most sensational film and the greatest spectacle ever produced. In addition to wonderful acting, costumes of great magnificence and massive and costly setting, the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius is shown which completely destroys Pompeii. One scene alone is without a parallel in the dramatic or motographic history, viz., in the chariot races at the amphitheatre four chariots, each drawn by four horses at full gallop, are dashed together, killing five horses.

FOR THE CROWN

The second of the "Adventures of Jacques," which production proved immensely popular throughout the American continent and is proving a big hit abroad.

Lorimer Johnston is the author and producer, and much credit is due him for the splendid settings, the perfect costuming and great care with which the most minute details are worked out.

Warren Kerrigan again plays the part of Jacques, and his dramatization of the character is immense; he very ably portrays the cavalier of the Louis XIV period, and is intelligently supported by a talented cast, including Vivian Rich, Jack Richardson, George Periolat, Louise Lester and a host of others whose faces are very rapidly becoming very popular with moving picture fans.

Little Helen Armstrong deports herself as the infant king in a most admirable and commendable style, and lends a very apt touch of child life to the production.

HAUPTMANN'S "ATLANTIS"

The distinguished German literary genius, Gerhart Hauptmann, is the latest celebrity in the world of letters to give consent to have one of his masterpieces reproduced in moving pictures. The Great Northern Film Co., after persistent urgings, obtained his consent to produce his masterpiece, "Atlantis," and neither effort nor expense has been spared in depicting the thrilling incidents set down in the novel of the talented German author. To thse who have read the story of "Atlantis" the task will be fully appreciated, and when it is announced that the feature is to be shown in nine reels, the magnitude of the task will be appreciated. Hauptmann insisted that nothing be done by halves, and the Great Northern management, being the pioneers in the field of features, gratified his every wish; including the selection of several principals, the settings and the far away travels of company and cameramen in order to supply the atmosphere which had been provided in the book.

The Scandinavian-American liner C. J. Tietgen, 12,000 tons burden, was chartered with officers and crew at a cost of $6,000, and 500 passengers were placed aboard the steamship in order to lose nothing along the lines of realism as so graphically set down by Hauptmann. At the request of the author, the principal role has been enacted by Madame Orloff, of Vienna, and the "Armless Wonder," Arthur Stoss, is played by Unthan, who was Hauptmann's model for the original of the story.

Gerhart Hauptmann, the winner of the $10,000 Nobel prize for literature, has taken a lively interest in the film production of "Atlantis," and the outlay of the Great Northern Co. for this feature is estimated at $60,000.

The appearance of Mrs. Fiske, America's greatest artiste, in motion pictures, marks another epoch in the history of film progress. "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," Thomas Hardy's inspired story, made famous on the stage by Mrs. Fiske's glorious portrayal and just recently produced by the Famous Players Film Company, is one of the greatest subjects ever introduced into motion pictures. The powerful combination of one of the foremost actresses of the day and the most noted work of a famous novelist should serve to place the Famous Players on an even more important plane than it has before occupied. This production is the first of the "30 Famous Features a Year," to be released by the Famous Players on its extended program.

Joe Hopp, of the Standard Film Exchange, Chicago, was a visitor to the metropolis this week.

Ben Wilson caused about as large a local disturbance as the big storm which struck New York recently. Like everyone else in the studio, he was caught without an umbrella. He had been working for George Lessey that afternoon in a scene in which an umbrella played an important part.

Richard Tucker, a bank clerk, was accused of stealing ten thousand dollars, which had fallen into an open umbrella at the side of a desk. Ben Wilson, as his brother-in-law, had stuck by him until he was proven innocent. Wilson thought of the umbrella when he started home but forgot the ten thousand dollars. It had stopped raining when he left the studio but began again when he reached Webster avenue. As he raised the umbrella the ten thousand dollars in stage money was scattered on the pavement and every sheltering doorway was vacated by loungers and refugees from the storm who eagerly helped to pick up the money, in hope of a reward. There were several harsh words spoken when Wilson smilingly walked on and they found themselves in possession of pieces of wet paper not worth a postage stamp.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

There are rumors of further combinations of film producers.

Appearances indicate that the most recent combination will control the greater part—more than eighty per cent—of the film output in this country.

Advocating the elimination of disastrous price-cutting, we believe in reasonable competition, and deprecate such combinations as are likely to run foul of the United States statutes prohibiting unlawful monopolization in any industry.

Dishonest competition is equally as bad as unlawful monopoly, both of which should be eliminated in order that a middle, reasonable-price ground may afford a firm foundation in all branches of the industry.

It will be interesting to watch the proceedings between the Eastman Kodak Company and the Ansco Company, involving the basic film patents. We will report them as they progress. Good luck to both, but may the right prevail eventually.

With the announcements of the numerous feature releases by the manufacturers it is evident that the multiple reel is bound to be the popular form of film entertainment, for the present, at least. Owing to the keen competition by all of the companies to outrival their competitors, a splendid program is offered and the best artists have offered their services in the feature productions of dramatic successes in film form.

The elimination of objectionable stories has been partly accomplished and in their stead the public is offered the best of historical and dramatic scenes. From an educational standpoint no other form of amusement has accomplished so much for the masses; from an entertaining and educational standpoint, the production of such magnificent films as "Quo Vadis," "Last Days of Pompeii," "Mary Stuart," the Bernhardt and Mrs Fiske productions, "Arizona," "Ivanhoe," and "Robin Hood," and many others, in addition to the wonderful scientific subjects, we may feel that the future of cinematography is assured on a firmer, nobler and better basis than at any time since its inception.

MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Official Call for Illinois and Indiana Convention

The motion picture exhibitors of the State of Illinois will meet in convention at Peoria, Tuesday and Wednesday, September 23rd and 24th. Every member of our league is urged to attend the convention, and every bona fide exhibitor in the State of Illinois, whether they are members or not, are invited to attend. This will be the most important convention ever held in the State of Illinois, as new set of officers will be elected to fill the vacancies of all officers who bolted the New York national convention. Every exhibitor will be entertained and the evening of the 24th a big banquet will be served.

Signed, M. A. NEFF, President of
The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The exhibitors of the State of Indiana will meet on Tuesday, September 30th, and Wednesday, October 1st, either in Indianapolis or Muncie. Big preparations are being made for this convention. Every member of the M. P. E. L. of A. is expected to attend. Splendid entertainments are being planned and a big banquet will be held at night. Every bona fide exhibitor in the State of Indiana is invited to attend. Officers will be elected to fill the vacancies of the delegates that were suspended by the national organization in New York

Signed, M. A. NEFF, President of

NEW ORGANIZATION IN MASSACHUSETTS

Massachusetts State Branch No. 21 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America have voted to immediately disband and return their charter. A new organization has been formed calling itself The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of Massachusetts and will be, for the time being, an independent organization.

The Gaumont Weekly No. 77 contained a rather complete review of the Diggs-Caminetti trial in San Francisco. This was the first animated record covering this international story to appear anywhere. Another film on the same subject will be released September 1st, but the Gaumont Weekly beat all its competitors in handling this important news matter.

Business, which has recently progressed at a rapid rate with Gaumonts, necessitated extension of office space, and to meet the needs of far away friends, who when visiting New York have little time to visit Flushing, it was decided to open central offices in The World's Tower Building where they have taken the fifteenth floor. This in addition to giving Gaumonts more office space will enable visitors to call at 1503 World's Tower Building and see some of the great attractions that will shortly be released.

IVANHOE

The Spectacular Three Reel "Imp" Feature Adapted from Scott's Famous Historical Novel. Produced in England with King Baggot in the Title Role, and to Be Released Shortly by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

The first view of the Ivanhoe films was presented this week in the projecting room of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company in the Mecca Building. The production may be unquestionably characterized as a stirring drama, whatever difference of opinion may exist in regard to its artistic merit. In order to bring the striking scenes of Scott's novel within the compass of a three-reel feature Herbert Brenon, who had charge of the production in England, had to resort to a decidedly free adaptation, but in the main the mediæval atmosphere has been well reproduced.

The piece is presented by an excellent cast headed by King Baggot as Ivanhoe. Leah Baird is seen to advantage as Rebecca and Evelyn Hope is also well cast as Rowena. Herbert Brenon offers a most effective character sketch as Isaac of York, and W. Scott Craven invests the part of Richard Cœur de Lion with royal dignity and commendable vigor.

King Baggot renewed his claim to histrionic versatility by his capital portrayal of the title role. He looked the daring Knight Templar to the very life, and his attractive personality and manly bearing make it a matter of small wonder that both Rebecca and Rowena should have fallen in love with the gallant knight.

The production reveals in living action the wonderful pageantry and the exciting and complex life of the days of Richard Cœur de Lion, Robin Hood and Ivanhoe. Retainers, lords and ladies, knights templars, monks, priests, prisoners, jailers and men-at-arms galore are introduced, and the production also abounds in characteristic pictures of the period, presenting strong contrasts between the Saxons and the Normans. Approximately five hundred persons are involved in the various episodes, notably the battle scenes in which about fifty horses appear in action. The battle scenes are enacted with mediæval realism so far as they could be reproduced in these modern days of air ships and dynamite. The armored knights go into action duly fitted out with the requisite assortment of swords, spears and shields. The Greenwood men of Robin Hood and the adherents of Front de Bœuf engage in vigorous combat, and fight in a manner that denotes expert direction and ample rehearsal.

With the object of lending pictorial similitude to the scenic settings the producers prevailed upon the Duke of Beaufort to place Chepstow Castle, one of the finest relics of mediæval architecture, at their disposal in order to make use of it as a substitute for Torquilstone Castle described by Scott. Chepstow Castle is in Monmouth, and is built on the limestone cliffs overhanging the river edge. It is perched high above the surrounding country, and its ruined battlements and ivy-covered walls still suggest the strength and power of the mediæval lords.

The scenes that are enacted at Torquilstone Castle consequently create the requisite illusion and are imbued to some extent with the genuine atmosphere of the Middle Ages. The battle scenes in front of the castle are particularly convincing in their vivid realism. The interior scenes of the castle also add to the mediæval realism of the production, among others the dungeon scene in which Isaac of York is tortured to induce him to give up his accumulated gold, and the scene in which Rebecca is pursued by de Bois Guilbert.

Another scene that will probably attract even more attention than the battle incident in front of Torquilstone Castle is the scene of the third reel in which Rebecca is about to be burned as a witch at the instigation of de Bois Guilbert. Most effective also is the scene in which Ivanhoe arrives and proclaims that he is ready to fight as Rebecca's champion, and then engages in mortal combat with her accuser.

It is needless to say that the reproduction of the natural scenery surrounding Chepstow Castle forms a decidedly picturesque ingredient of this classic film. The woodland scene in which Robin Hood blows his bugle and his men flock to him from all points of the compass may be said to be one of the most unique and effective pictures that has been thrown on the screen in a long time.

Now that we have given an idea of the merits of the acting and the pictorial presentment of this spectacular feature, it may be of interest to relate the incidents of the story in accordance with the manner in which they have been adapted for moving picture purposes.

In the days when Richard III, known as Cœur de Lion, or the Lion Heart, was King of England there lived at the mansion of Rotherwood, not many miles from where Sheffield now stands, a Saxon nobleman named Cedric. Cedric had had troubles enough during his stormy life, but never had he been known to bend the knee before the Norman tyrants. One of the greatest sorrows of his life had been that his son Wilfred, better known as Ivanhoe, had not shown the same aversion to the custom and manners of the conquerors.

Ivanhoe had shown himself such an apt adherent of the Normans and such an assiduous attendant at the Court of King Richard that that monarch had rewarded him with the gift of the manor of Ivanhoe. All this annoyed Cedric, who at first contented himself with remonstrances.

With Cedric there dwelt a beautiful Saxon girl of the blood-royal of England. Her parents had died in her youth, and Cedric had adopted her and cherished her as a daughter. It chanced that Wilfred looked with eyes of love upon the fair Rowena, and Cedric, resolved that the rare Saxon pearl should mate with none who had knelt to the Normans, bade Ivanhoe begone and trouble him no more.

These were the days when Christian Knights were fighting for the true Cross in the Holy Land, and Ivanhoe proceeded to join the standard of Richard the Lion Heart. At this point begins the story of Ivanhoe, or rather the adaptation of Scott's novel as it is thrown on the screen.

Cedric, sickened with the insults to which the Saxons were subjected and brooding over the disappointment he had had in his son, grew daily more morose. He was greatly cheered, however, by the knowledge that Athelstane, the noblest Saxon of them all, desired her hand in marriage.

Of Ivanhoe there had been no news, and in his absence Prince John bestowed the barony of Ivanhoe on Reginald Front de Bœuf—Reginald Bull's head, so named on account of his tremendous neck and head. This man was one of the worst types of Norman nobility. His licentiousness, greed and cruelty had made his name a thing to shudder at far and wide. He lived in his castle of Torquilstone, from which he governed the barony of Ivanhoe which bordered on the estate of Cedric the Saxon.

Athelstane now arrives and with the connivance of Cedric, who well approves his cause, urges his suit with Rowena, who, however, still cherishing the memory of her old playmate, Ivanhoe, rejects his proposal. This interview is witnessed by a Palmer, a holy man, licensed by the Pope to bear arms in defence of the Cross. A smile of delight passes over the face of the Palmer as the Saxon lady refuses the suit of the noble Athelstane, for the priest's hood and gown conceal no other identity than that of the banished Ivanhoe, who, on his return from his adventures in the Holy Land, chose this disguise that he might once more be near his father and his sweetheart, and learn their present feelings toward him.

After this interview, the Palmer approaches Rowena, who, unable to penetrate his disguise, but knowing he has just returned from Palestine, asks him for news of her lover, Ivanhoe, whereupon the soi-disant holy man hands her a scroll in the handwriting of Ivanhoe, which gives her great joy.

Meanwhile Prince John, who sees in Cedric an undoubted partisan of Richard Cœur de Lion, whose throne the prince is seeking to usurp, is seen approaching the castle. In his company are Reginald Front de Bœuf, Cedric's evil neighbor, and Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert, a Knight Templar, and a libertine of the lowest order. Their intention is to capture Cedric and his ward, Rowena, and bear them to Front de Bœuf's castle of Torquilstone, there to extinguish the last dying ember of Saxon chivalry, and wipe out one of Richards' most powerful allies.

Their arrival is announced by Gurth, the Swineherd, to his master, Cedric, who bids them welcome to his table, trying the while to conceal his hatred of these Norman libertines.

ROBIN HOOD AND FRIAR TUCK

The scene then changes to the forest where are seen two weary travelers using what remaining strength they have to gain shelter before sunset. These are the wealthy Jewish money-lender, Isaac of York, and his beautiful daughter Rebecca. Seeing Cedric's mansion in the distance, the two hasten to its portals and crave food and shelter for the night. They are admitted, and while everyone shrinks in disgust from the Jew, who is forced to eat his meal with the Palmer at the fireside, Rebecca, whose superb beauty has aroused the sensual passion of Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert, is conducted by that Knight to a seat by his side at the table.

While de Bois Guilbert is trying to ensnare the virtuous Rebecca, Front de Bœuf is thinking of the probable wealth of her father, Isaac, and resolves that some of his wealth shall be extracted from him. Meanwhile de Bois Guilbert, flushed with wine, becomes insulting in his attentions to Rebecca. who is, however, protected by Ivanhoe, disguised as the Palmer.

The Knights retire to complete their plans for the capture of the Saxons and the Jew and his daughter. Ivanhoe, overhearing this latter part of the plan, hastens to advise Isaac and Rebecca of their danger. He urges them to escape and conducts them to the gate of the castle where, however, the party is met by Gurth the Swineherd, who refuses to unlock the portal until Ivanhoe reveals his identity. Then he allows Isaac and his daughter to pass out, whereupon Ivanhoe finds himself attacked on all sides by Front de Bœuf. Brian de Bois Guilbert and de Bracy. Drawing his sword, Ivanhoe, with his back to the wall, fights on, till stunned and weakened by loss of blood from his wounds, he sinks fainting to the floor.

When Ivanhoe recovers consciousness he sees his father, Cedric, and his sweetheart, Rowena, being borne off captive by the villainous Norman Knights. Unable to follow or succor them, he drags himself painfully into the forest and falls fainting at the feet of Isaac and Rebecca. The fair Jewess deplores his sorry plight, and her heart is moved strangely by a new-born love for the handsome and valiant stranger.

When Ivanhoe again swoons from loss of blood, Rebecca and Isaac leave him to fetch water to bathe his wounds. While thus engaged, they are discovered and captured by Front de Bœuf and his men. who, having safely bestowed their prisoners, Cedric and Rowena, in the castle of Torquilstone, had gone to seek the Jew and Jewess who had escaped them. So that, when our hero recovers from his swoon, he discovers that his new-found friends have vanished, and the sight of a troop of armed men disappearing in the distance indicates their capture. Suddenly through the woodland glades there rings upon his ears the sound of jovial laughter.

Crawling to the spot from which emanated this token of mirth, Ivanhoe is overjoyed to find himself in the presence of his king, Richard Cœur de Lion, under whose standard he had fought in the Holy Land. Close by are Robin Hood and Friar Tuck, the jovial priest whose merry jests have caused Richard to indulge in boisterous laughter. All agree to rescue Cedric and Rowena as well as the Jew and Jewess. Then at a blast from the horn of Robin Hood hundreds of Greenwood men respond to their leader's signal, and at once begin their march on the castle of Torquestone.

In the meantime the Normans begin to work their wicked will upon their helpless captives. Rowena and Cedric are left more or less in peace, but Isaac of York is not so fortunate, for the avaricious Front de Bœuf is preparing to extract, by means of torture, a goodly part of the fortune of the unfortunate money-lender. In another part of the castle Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert is endeavoring to force his odious attentions on Rebecca, who, driven to desperation, threatens to throw herself from a precipice. But Rebecca's leap and the torture of her father are stayed, for on the woodland air is borne the faint notes of the horn which announces the approach of Robin Hood and his merry men coming to the rescue.

De Bois Guilbert and Front de Bœuf leave their prisoners and rushing to the main courtyard leap to horse and sound the call to arms. Shortly afterwards the Norman knights pour in hundreds from the portals of the castle. Then ensues a bloody battle. In the thickest of the battle may be seen the stalwart form of Ivanhoe, while almost equal in prowess are the feats of the Black Knight. The terrible onslaught of the brave Greenwood men forces the Normans to take refuge within the castle walls. The door is speedily broken down by the attacking force, and another fierce fight takes place in the courtyard.

Meanwhile Rebecca, seeing that the victory of her friends is now assured, goes in search of her father, when suddenly she finds herself face to face with her persecutor, Sir Brian de Bois Guilbert, who, seeing defeat inevitable, has forsaken the fray. With a yell of triumph, he seizes her in his iron arms, and throwing her across his saddle rides away with his prey.

The day is now decided in favor of the attacking party, and quickly the captive Cedric and his daughter and the Jew, Isaac, are released. And thus for the first time since Ivanhoe's banishment Cedric looks upon the face of the son whom he had disinherited, but whom he now embraces and pardons.

There is still more work, however, for the valiant arm of Ivanhoe, for Isaac tells the tale of his daughter's capture by de Bois Guilbert. A fruitless search is made for her in the forest, after which the rescuers and the rescued camp for the night in the leafy glades of Sherwood. It happens, however, that there is one witness to the abduction of Rebecca, and this is none other than our old friend Gurth the Swineherd, who follows the knight and captive to the castle which forms the headquarters of that branch of the Good Templars to which de Bois Guilbert belonged. Here, finding his advances still repulsed, and filled with feelings of hate for the defeat his arms had sustained, de Bois Guilbert causes Rebecca to be brought before a tribunal of the Order of Good Templars on a charge of sorcery.

The trial is brief. Rebecca is found guilty and is sentenced to be burnt at the stake in three days' time. There remains but one chance for Rebecca to escape with her life, and that is to find a champion to do battle with one of her accusers and establish by his victory or defeat her innocence or her guilt. This chance she adopts, and taking a mailed glove she flings it down as a sign of challenge.

Gurth, who witnesses the scene, thrusts himself forward and asks to be allowed to find a champion for her. This privilege is granted, and he sets off on a journey which results in his finding Ivanhoe and Robin Hood. On hearing of Rebecca's danger, Ivanhoe at once decides to champion her cause, and promises to appear in time to save her from her awful sentence.

The day of execution arrives. A big dais has been erected, which is quickly filled by a throng of Knights Templars eager to see the dying agony of the Jewish maiden. Rebecca is bound to the stake, and the faggots lie piled round her feet. A blast is blown on the trumpets of the heralds to demand if there be a champion who will come forward to do combat to prove the innocence or guilt of the prisoner.

There is no response.

A second blast is blown and the crowd seems a-tiptoe with expectation. Still there is no response. Presently there is a stir amongst the crowd. Isaac of York forces his way through the throng and rushes to embrace his daughter. He has come to see if gold or the promise of gold will save her. He is hurled aside and made a captive.

Again the trumpet blows. Still there is no response. The Grand Master of the Templars gives a signal, and the torch-bearers approach and set fire to the faggots. An ill-suppressed groan of pleasurable anticipation arises from the spectators when suddenly an armored knight approaches, aand kicks the burning faggots aside. The knight then uplifts his vizier and discloses the features of Ivanhoe. Thereupon he challenges de Bois Guilbert to mortal combat. A fierce combat ensues which results in the death of de Bois Guilbert. Ivanhoe is adjudged the victor by the Grand Master of the Templars and Rebecca is set at liberty.

Now arrives the Black Knight, who has cast off his disguise, and appears as Richard, King of England. He causes the arrest of the treacherous and cruel Knights Templars. Ivanhoe is knighted for his prowess in arms and his loyalty to his sovereign, and the manor and lands of Ivanhoe are restored to him.

Cedric, happy in his reconciliation with his son, repairs with Ivanhoe and the lady Rowena to the forest, where they are soon joined by Isaac of York and Rebecca, who come to express their gratitude and bid a last farewell. Although herself in love with Ivanhoe, who has twice saved her life at the peril of his own, Rebecca joins his hand in that of Rowena—and, with her father, departs. In the very last scene of the film we have a sight of Isaac embracing the daughter with whom he has endured so many perils. She, however, seems not to notice his caresses. Her eyes are turned towards the setting sun. Before her arises the vision of Ivanhoe in the arms of his affianced bride. She thinks of the love she bears him and the happiness that might have been hers had he but returned her love.

FEATURE FILM NOTES

W. H. Laurance, who has been manager of Union Features for the past few months, leaves that company on September 1st to take charge of the Indianapolis office of Warner's Features, Inc.

Mr. Laurance is a fully experienced film man having been in the business for the past seven years. He is one of the pioneers, starting the feature game in that branch of the business at its very beginning. As manager for American Feature Film Company of Chicago, he put on the market one of the first three-reel American films ever made, namely, "Twenty Years in Sing Sing."

Before his connection with the Chicago concern he was road man for one of the largest film exchanges in the Middle West. Prior to that time, he successfully managed several theatres.

The varied experience of Mr. Laurance should make him a very valuable asset to Warner's Features, as he is able to understand film business from the standpoint of seller, renter and exhibitor.

The Eclectic Film Company have all their multiple reel productions copyrighted. Hearing of a surreptitious booking of a few piratical copies of the film, "The Mysteries of Paris," they immediately engaged counsel to look after their interests and were successful in seizing one print of the film in Cleveland, O., several weeks ago.

Last Saturday, August 23rd, an opportunity presented itself to seize another print of "The Mysteries of Paris," for which the exhibition rights in Greater New York were acquired by the Exclusive Features, Inc., 24 East Twenty-first street, New York City. The film was seized while being shown at the Willis Airdrome, at Willis avenue and One Hundred and Forty-fifth street, by the United States marshal, together with all advertising matter that was used in billing the production at the theatre named.

The Eclectic Film Company, when seen about this latest seizure of one of their copyrighted films, were emphatic in their statement that they would, regardless of time and money expended, protect their State Rights buyers to a finish.

The Eclectic Film Company wishes to have it distinctly understood that it will stand back of any buyer of their film with all the vast resources at their command.

A record in territorial sales has probably been broken by the All Star Feature Corporation whose initial play-production in pictures of "Arizona," Augustus Thomas' big success, will be ready for its first showing about September 1st. Harry R. Raver, president of the company, authorizes the statement that $133,000 worth of territory has already been closed for All Star productions.

On Friday last The Famous Players Film Company of New England, located at Boston; The Famous Players Film Service, Inc., of Pittsburgh, Pa.; The Electric Theatre Supply Company, of Philadelphia, Pa., and Sol. Lesser, of the Golden Gate and Pacific Feature Film Companies, of California, closed contracts.

Boston gets the New England States, Pittsburgh takes Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky; Philadelphia operates eastern Pennsylvania, southern New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia, while Lesser gets California, Arizona, Nevada, Oregon, Idaho, Washington and Montana. These are the latest contracts closed.

These negotiations were consummated by Mr. Raver on his personal assurance of good films as it was not possible to exhibit the production up to this time as the work of staging "Arizona" will not be finished for another week.

A handsome eight-page folder, illustrating in miniature the large line of lithographic printing for "Arizona," the All Star Feature Corporation's first release, is now being circulated among the trade. Eight new styles of posters are being added to these and a supplement will be issued later. This is perhaps the first time so extensive and elaborate a poster bulletin system has been used for motion pictures. Twenty-eight separate posters will be used to herald the coming "Arizona," allowing for a liberal billboard display if the exhibitor desires.

In order to carry out their idea of marketing a feature program the middle of September, Warner's Features, Inc., have secured the very best men to be obtained for the various positions of responsibility throughout their organization.

Samuel Grant, formerly in charge of the Gordon theatres throughout the New England States, and for the past six months general manager of the Warner's Exchange in Boston, has been made district manager for the territory east of Chicago. He is succeeded in Boston by H. F. Campbell, who recently resigned from the Boston office of the Universal.

D. J. Chatkin, who until recently was in charge of the Universal office at Toledo, Ohio, becomes manager of Warner's Buffalo office.

Joseph Klein, brother of Arthur Klein, the theatrical agent, has gone to Atlanta to assume the duties of manager of that office.

Jack J. Gilroy has been succeeded in the New York rental office by Jacques Spiegel, whose experience in the film business dates back to the days of the old Hudson Film Exchange. At one time during his business career Mr. Spiegel was associated with the Kessell and Bauman Exchanges, and recently has been with the Mecca branch of the Universal.

Cable reports received from Richard Edmondson, who recently sailed for Europe after having established here the Film Releases of America, who will release one feature weekly beginning with "Dr. Nicholson and the Blue Diamond" in four reels, makes it certain that this shipment, because of Continental delays, cannot be shipped until September 8th, two weeks after schedule time.

Among the visitors at the offices of the Exclusive Supply Corporation seeking quotations on productions during the past week were J. Singer, of the Attractive Feature Film Company, of Philadelphia, and E. B. Johnson, representing the Turner-Dahnkey Circuit, of San Francisco, who are seeking a weekly program of twenty-five reels.

Work is being rushed on the new quarters for Warner's Features, Inc., at 126 West Forty-sixth street, New York City. The entire eighth floor of the Leavitt Building is rapidly being converted into a magnificent suite of offices. Provision has been made for a large theatre, exchange quarters, directors' room, executive offices, publicity department, bookkeepers' department and poster department. The specifications called for partitions of mahogany and plate glass, and furnishings of quiet elegance throughout. These quarters will be ready early in September.

The Itala subject, "The Palace of Flames," the Dawson-Yukon territorial rights for which have been sold to A. R. Thorne, of Fairbanks, Alaska. "The Greater Love," the Itala two-reel feature, is now being booked heavily in Canada by the Canadian Film Exchange, by W. E. Greene for the New England territory, Weiland Feature Film Co., of Pittsburgh, and others. The Peerless Film & Supply Company, of Indianapolis, have purchased rights on Indiana and Kentucky for "The Fatal Grotto." O. W. Moore, of Indianapolis, has purchased the rights for "The Dread of Doom" for the same states.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Takes It Seriously

HOMER sang his lays of Greek heroes for the same reason the classic fishmonger peddled fish. Gouverneur Morris, novelist and short-story writer, has it figured out that way, at least. "The successful literary worker is he who takes writing seriously. He studied the public as a means of making a living," said Morris recently. "He studies the public with the idea of finding out what the public wants. Then, in accordance with world-old rules of economics, he sets about to supply the demand. The public wants to be amused as well as educated," said Morris. What Morris says regarding fiction writing is applicable to moving pictureplay-writing. The work must be taken seriously for it is no child's play. The sooner the beginner becomes relieved of the notion that plot writing is just as easy as anything in the world and that all that is required is just to "scribble off" something, the sooner will he have cut his eye teeth. Take it seriously, writing pictureplays is a man's work.

As to Titles

"I have witnessed many pictureplays the titles of which were entirely inappropriate," writes in a well-known critic. "I would not like to have my titles changed for I spend a great deal of time and earnest thought upon them. But, if in the opinion of the editor or director they do not fit the story as well as one they could choose, I would be willing and thank them for it. I do not think sufficient attention is given titles." Many editors are prone to let any old title suffice and this is a mistake. Titles should be attractive and, at the same time comprehensive and appropriate.

Lacking the Punch

A St. Louis scribe writes: "Your dissertation on 'nice-looking scripts, but——' hits the nail right on the head. For a year or more I paid more attention to the appearance of my scripts than I did to what they contained. I revised and revised and red-inked and indented until I had revised all the life out of my stuff and had a manuscript that for appearances was certainly a work of art. Of course, it is understood that scripts should appear neat, clean and proper, but, at the same time, there is such a thing as making them entirely too proper. By this I mean that painstaking craftsmen will sometimes sacrifice everything to technique and appearance and unconsciously lose the 'snapper.' At least that was my case, and your paragraph in a recent issue of the News was the first treatise on this habit that ever came to my observation. Be careful with your revisions and do not revise the indefinable something called the 'punch' from your stories. I find that I work better right off the bat in the first flush of work and that when I go over it cold, I am apt to ruin the story." It is a fact that many literary workers are better "right off the bat" to quote our correspondent. Their inspiration comes in the first writing and it is better to leave it so. Others are what are termed "cold workers" and their stuff is best when gone over carefully several times and rehashed. The same rule applies to newspaper writing. We have known reporters to sit at a typewriter and knock off a tip-top story while others must rewrite their introduction or "lead" several times before the "right hang" comes along. Of course, in daily newspaper work there isn't time for much revision, but many never learn the knack of writing a story off-hand. They must go over, at least the "lead," several times before the follow-up comes hot. Work the way that brings the best results to you.

The Credit Question Again

An author in taking us to task for urging credit to the author of the pictureplay on screen, poster, and in trade journals, says that we should urge better prices for authors because all the author needs is a good name with editors and producers. Surely, an author needs a good name with editor and producer, that is perfectly understood. But nevertheless the writer might be able to ask better prices for his work if the public liked his pictures and applauded when his name appeared under the title. Then again, we are for a fair field and no favor for any script writer. It has been customary to flash the long name of one certain writer over every plotless Civil War drama ever released by one certain concern. The writer had little to do with producing the dramas which called for work on the part of the director, not the author. Here is one notable instance where credit was not equalized. If this man is entitled to credit on the screen hundreds of others are also entitled to recognition. We think like Captain Peacocke that credit on poster and screen will come sooner or later. In order to be impartial why not use the names of both the author and the director?

He Says It Is "Rot"

Here is a hot one from a director of moving picture plays: "All this hue and cry about editors editing and directors directing is plain 'rot.' Just so long as there are artistic directors employed, just so long will the director, who has to shoulder most of the responsibility, work his pleasure with any script that he likes. You can take it from me that there will be no editors handing out scripts with orders to produce exactly as written. That would be an impossibility for many of the best producers of this day and age. We directors must have latitude and we must rise or fall by the results of our individual working ideas, not what some script writer or editor thinks should be our ideas. The editor is the presiding genius at a sort of clearing house. He should know the best work of every director employed and furnish him scripts best suited for his ability. If the director likes an idea contained in a script and accepts the script and pays for it, it is up to him to make the picture. If he wishes to change the action radically, it is his privilege and will be just so long as there are artistic directors. I repeat that this discussion about directors directing and editors editing is 'rot.' Of necessity, the director will continue to edit about as he likes, responsible only as to the merit of the stuff he turns out." There was more to the above letter, but we print the kernel of it. Anybody else wish to join in the argument? It is free for all.

Now $100 Weekly

A school for photoplay writers located at Washington, D. C., urges all to "earn $100 weekly writing motion picture plays." We assure you that we will do our best.

We Believe It

Several Universal directors are quoted with asserting that they find it impossible to obtain scripts worthy of serious consideration. We are inclined to agree with them particularly anent that slap-stick stuff being released.

The English Markets

We have received several inquiries recently anent English markets for script writers. Submit your stuff to American markets. Better prices are paid in the United States and better treatment is accorded authors. And then it isn't necessary to spell wagon with two g's when sending scripts out to roost in Uncle Samuel's domain.

Pertinent Pointers

Include a pair of postal scales in your desk supplies.

If there is a job printer in your town or city, chances are that you can purchase good stationery cheaper and have it cut just as you wish.

Writing is plain drudgery to some. However, it must be done in order to succeed. Be systematic and compel yourself to write so much every day. There was never a splendid piece of literary work turned out that did not conceal toil and trouble.

The only way to write is to write. Keep writing and then write some more. Not necessarily for publication or production but for experience and practice. Only send out that which you think is your best.

If you wish to withdraw a script, write that you withdraw the script to submit elsewhere and shall hold the company responsible if the script is used. Register your letter.

Do not imitate any style of script. Be original and have a style of your own. Of course there are certain rules of technique that are essential, but every literary worker has little peculiarities that crop out in work and that are original. When you study the scripts of others you are apt to imitate in a laudable endeavor to become successful. Lay out your own scripts the best you can and do not depend too much on others. In other words, learn to stand alone.

About two out of every three letters we receive from beginners contain questions about trick effects and in two out of every three answers we send to beginners we urge them to leave trick effects alone and stick to the simple plot. Mechanical tricks involve a great deal of work and editors and directors are not partial to those scripts which abound in "dissolves," "fades," etc. Don't relate your story as a dream. This idea is as old as Methusela, anyhow, and has been worked to death.

Please do not write questions on post-cards and send them in. We do not like post-cards, that is, unless they are of the souvenir variety, which we like to receive from friends. Write a letter and enclose an envelope stamped and self-addressed. We conduct the only department in which good, honest advice is given by mail without fee or favor. You ought to appreciate the service sufficiently to write under and enclose a two-cent stamp.

Yes, yes, Keystone is the only company we know of that wishes the synopsis only. This does not mean that a short story is desired; it means that the editor wants real ideas in brief narrative form and perhaps with a 500-word limit. Because Keystone reads synopses only does not signify that all other editors wish ideas submitted to them in that manner. However, we have an idea that the synopsis form of story will become more popular before so very long.

The Solax Co., Fort Lee, N. J., is in the market for high-class comedies and emotional dramas. The editor of Solax recently stated that good ideas were scarce, and that only a few seemed to observe the technical requirements, and that nine out of every ten scripts bought had to be rewritten. This takes work and brings down the purchase price.

Gaumont, Pathé, Thanhouser and Warner Features are not in the market for scripts.

Editorial Etchings

Miss Birch is now editor for Vitagraph, succeeding Mrs. Breuil.

Will M. Ritchey, formerly city editor of the Los Angeles Express, is now head of the Lubin Western script department.

Hall Caine has promised to write plots for Liebler-Vitagraph Feature Film Co. Needless to say, his name will appear on the screen.

Carolyn Wells is another well-known writer of fiction who has turned to moving picture play writing. She is receiving much advertising.

Eugene Valentine Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, takes a camera along when he goes vacationing.

George Blaisdell, the well-known writer, sends us a souvenir post-card from the wilds of the Empire State, where he has been enjoying a deserved vacation.

A. W. Thomas, now editor of the Photoplay Magazine, formerly conducted the script writing department when the magazine was edited by Neil G. Caward.

A Poser From Posner

Mr. George A. Posner is sharp and to the point in this one: "A check in payment for a script is a practical acknowledgment to the writer, whoever he may be, that his work has surpassed the 'efforts' of thousands of just as earnest brother writers, editors of experience, staff and contract writers,' otherwise it would not have passed. Therefore why the fifteen-dollar check?" You can search us!

Lincoln Steffens' Method

There is another communication from Mr. Posner which we think worthy of another paragraph. He writes: "Mr. Lincoln Steffens, the noted writer, in a recent letter, wrote me some advice that has been of such help to me that I pass it along for the benefit of the script writing fraternity. 'It is an unusual success you are having. Take it. Take it as you are taking it. Enjoy it. Don't be afraid of being spoiled by it. You won't be if you keep working, working, working. And let me tell you a secret: The men in our profession who use well their first success carry it on to achievement—through work. They work hard. They are seen mostly at play and they don't let on that they work. But they do. By work they attain their art. They read, they study, they think, they fail. So don't be afraid to work with all the might you have in every little thing you do. Be your hardest judge. Don't linger too long over a thing that is done. Enjoy it, as I say, for a minute; enjoy it to the full. Then drop it. It is done. Drop it, and go on with the thing that remains to be done. And for the rest, study the thing that is nearest to you. Study it. Dramatic ideas are found in the most humble surroundings. Study and watch for them.'"

And Lincoln Steffens' advice has been the keynote for the success of many. Hard work and lots of it. Years of toilsome newspaper work taught Steffens the full significance of the word, writing. His words are inspiring. How true it is that the outsider frequently inclines to the belief that the literary worker does little or nothing to merit success! Literary workers are seen mostly at play. We were taking a little vacation "flyer" recently and a newly formed acquaintance said: "Well, I don't see how you find time to turn out all the stuff you do." We do turn out lots of stuff, such as it is. It takes constant work. We have one week of leisure in fifty-two. The other weeks are filled for us. We average ten hours daily, seven days to the week. You must work hard in any line if you would succeed in it. Work and not genius, so-called, is what counts.

Universally Important

We stop the press to announce that the Universal Film Manufacturing Company proposes to give credit on posters to legitimate authors of picture plays. This is an important ruling, and will result in Universal getting first readings on some classy scripts. We shall have further comment to make regarding this action next week. In the meantime, on behalf of aspiring picture playwrights, we hasten to congratulate Universal and its script staff, particularly Captain Leslie Peacocke, for helping along a creditable move.

"Stick to It"

A line from Will T. Henderson: "'Stick to it' are the proper words, and what a world of wisdom is bound up in those three little words, all praise be to Mr. Henry W. Mattoni. Many the times, when scripts have come merrily 'back home to roost,' I have felt inclined to let them 'roost.' But all of a sudden a 'still small voice' says 'stick to it,' and so I have. Of course, we all love our children—even unto the children of our brain, and, as a rule, we feel kindly toward them. But when we send out 'children' on an errand, we are prone to feel just a little vexed if they do not accomplish the errand for which they were sent, not stopping to realize that frequently their inability to accomplish their object, more often than otherwise, is our own fault through lack of proper and intelligent instructions." This simile seems apt to us. Too often the children of your brains are sent forth but ill prepared to perform their intended errand. They need more careful preparation for the journey about to be undertaken and, instead of vague instruction, they should be sent forth to perform their missions in a clear and expeditious way.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

Mr. Lester Park, formerly of the Columbine Film Company, now district manager for Warner's Features, Inc., has been carefully investigating conditions around Dallas and Kansas City. He reports a lively interest in the forthcoming features to be released about the 15th of September through Warner's program. The Kansas City office has taken enlarged quarters on the fourth floor of the Gloyd Building, and it has been fitted up with everything needed to make it a big exchange.

STUDIO GOSSIP

James Keene, an Eastern moving picture producer, has arrived in San Francisco from New York with plans for a new $250,000 studio which he intends to build near this city. After looking over various sections of the state, Keene has decided that the country around San Francisco bay is better suited climatically and by reason of its wonderful scenery for the moving picture producing business than any other part of California.

San Rafael, Alameda, Berkeley, San Leandro and San Jose, through representative business men, have offered Keene various concessions and their co-operation if he will build his plant near their town.

The new company is being backed by Eastern capital in a large measure, and by some California capital. Feature films devoted to showing scenery of Northern California will be taken. There will be over one hundred actors employed the year around producing dramas pertaining to the early history of California. Several well-known stars, such as Frederick Ward, Nance O'Neil and James Neal, are already under contract to appear in the new productions.

Work on the new studio will commence about September 15th, and before the end of the year the new corporation will be well under way with its productions. The films will be handled through a moving picture exchange in New York and will be shown all over the world.

Word comes from Universal City to the effect that Director Otis Turner, of the "101 Bison" brand, has taken a specially selected company to San Francisco to commence a trio of stories dealing with the picturesque life of the corsairs and buccaneers. The features will be put on with an attention to historic detail that will eclipse anything that has ever before been attempted in that line. Several ancient Spanish galleons that saw actual service in the nefarious practice of piracy, have been secured, and have been restored to their original condition for use in the pictures.

They have the laugh on dignified Alec B. Francis over at Eclair. While the company was in the Adirondacks last week, Mr. Francis was playing the part of an officer in the Canadian Mounted Police. He had on a bright red coat. While crossing a field in order to reach the next location, Mr. Francis was startled to hear a disturbing noise behind. It was a case of a quick run and a few sharp dodges and even then some of the company had to play toreador with other red coats held at different parts of the fence before Mr. Francis escaped from John Bull's brother Bill.

Keep your weather eye open for those new Peerless films. Owing to copyright laws, the name Empire, under which brand these pictures were to be released, has been changed to Peerless. Kessel and Baumann, known throughout the trade and to the exhibitor as men who are always a "little ahead of the bunch" promise that these Naval and Puritan stories which will be filmed under the Peerless brand will "lead the field" in settings, photography and sensations.

A new face has been noticed of late in the Crystal pictureplays, which the most sophisticated fans have been at a loss to place. Investigation discloses the fact that the newcomer is none other than Henry Guell, who for years starred with Lily Langtry, playing opposite the Jersey Lily on her last tour of the United States. Besides being an actor of recognized ability, Mr. Guell is extremely good looking, and his advent to Crystal films will bring joy to the hearts of the matinee girls.

James Neal, the veteran stock actor and impresario, has joined the Universal forces as director. This announcement comes as a finale to a persistent campaign upon the part of General Manager Bernstein, of the West Coast Organization at Universal City, who offered a series of inducements that eventually persuaded him.

Miss Pearl White has returned to the Crystal studio after a trip through the East, in which she played a three days' engagement at the Olympic Theatre in Leominster, Mass., and at the Wizard Theatre in South Norwalk, Conn.

The first Florence Lawrence feature that has just been completed by Director Harry Salter for the Universal, is a strong love story that shows Miss Lawrence at her best. Bessie Bannon, Horace G. Plimpton's secretary, is still globe-trotting over on the other side. Ireland appealed most strongly to her—of course she is—and she writes: "We have traveled from the extreme south of Ireland to the extreme north, over 420 miles, and I have passed through the most wonderful locations for picture purposes. Edison pictures are very popular in Ireland. That girl never could forget business.

Big Bill Sheerer, the "man of many faces," who does character work for the American Eclair Company, hardly looks like a candy maker, yet he was at one time. Bill was once a regular guy at making candy.

In the days of long ago Sheerer got some very valuable experience in the medicine companies that used to travel our little land.. Bill was chief comedian for one organization, and for this he received the magnificent salary of $20 a month. But Bill had another income. He had the candy privilege.

Every night on the big platform, Bill would place his big candy hook, and there before the vast throng he would artistically "pull the taffy." When finished it would be sent through the crowd by boys, and the receipts were no small item. But who would ever think Bill could make taffy to see him on the screen to-day as a dignified old millionaire?

Two writers of reputation are responsible for releases to be presented by the Reliance in the near future. "The Glow Worm"—in three parts—is from the pen of Will Levington Comfort, who has written a number of successful novels. It appeared originally as a magazine story. Another two-part drama scheduled for early release is "The Stolen Woman," by Eleanor Ingram, which was published in Lippincott's Magazine and lends itself admirably to picture dramatization.

A crowd of about three hundred persons watched Fred Truesdell, dressed as a brainless son of a millionaire, and Milly Bright, the little beauty of the American Eclair Company, do a scene in the big Pennsylvania station one morning recently. Suddenly one excited old man rushed up to stick his head through the crowd. He turned to a man nearby and wanted to know "What is it, an elopement? Why don't they stop them?" Just then the director stepped into the scene and took hold of Fred to show him just about what position he wanted him to take. The old man almost pushed several people over trying to get in close enough to get to the excitement. The result was he got in front of the camera before he saw it and got a good bawling out from Mr. Director. It was some little time before the kind-hearted stranger knew exactly what was doing. He had never seen "movies" made before.

Director Edgar Lewis, of the Reliance, is enthusiastic about his latest picture, "Twickenham Ferry," which is a drama written around the popular classic "And 'tis But a Penny to Twickenham Town." The verses of the quaint old song run through the action of a modern rural drama in which Edgena de Lespine, Irene Hunt, Sue Balfour and Harry Spingler play the leading roles. The result is an artistic offering which should have a strong appeal.

They are still talking about Edison players down in Georgia and it is very evident that Charles M. Seay won a host of loyal friends in Atlanta. Of course, the fact that Seay told them that Atlanta was the best place in the United States for making pictures and that Mabel Trunnelle smiled her prettiest upon gallant Georgians undoubtedly had a good deal to do with it. However that may be, the Atlanta Journal cannot say enough in praise of the Edison players.

Bessie Learn, Herbert Prior, Ben Wilson, Augustus Phillips, Charles M. Seay, C. Jay Williams and others have become speed demons during the year, and now George Lessey put their noses out of joint by appearing in a brand new 1914 model. Barry O'Moore contributes another clever piece of character work as Sam Gerridge in "Caste." His delineation of the fiery artisan whose life consists of his love for Polly Eccles and his trade, shows the remarkable talent of this young actor for character portrayal. BIGELOW COOPER

Elsewhere we present a full page portrait of Bigelow Cooper who has had a valuable theatrical experience, having played in the first stock company of the Murray Hill Theatre, New York, and having also been a member of the Denver Stock Company. Mr. Cooper was leading man for four years with Nance O'Neill, under the management of McKee Rankin. After that he played in "The Thief," under the management of Daniel Frohman; and for several seasons filled engagements with the Shuberts and Charles Dillingham.

Two years ago Mr. Cooper entered the motion picture field under engagement to the Edison Company. He is still a member of the Edison Company and is one of the most versatile, as well as popular actors appearing on the screen to-day. Mr. Cooper has the gift of doing unusual things with pronounced histrionic ability. He always seems to fit in the picture, and may be depended on to give an effective portrayal of any role that has been entrusted to him.

CHESTER BEECROFT GOES WITH THE GENERAL FILM COMPANY

Chester Beecroft, who has been manager of the New York office of the Billboard for the past two years has resigned his position to accept the appointment of advertising and publicity manager for the General Film Company and will assume his duties on September 1st at No. 200 Fifth avenue. Mr. Beecroft has had a wide experience having been a special writer on New York daily papers, was formerly advertising and publicity manager for the Motion Picture Patents Company, and also was press representative for the Hotel Astor. The News wishes him success in his new position.

LILLIAN WALKER

Lillian Walker, whose charming face adorns the front cover, was born in Brooklyn, of Swedish parentage, about —well, not very long ago. Her first role on the speaking stage was as the ingenue in a melodrama called "The Little Organ Grinder," the cast comprising Maurice Costello in the lead and Mrs. Maurice in another part. Her next engagement was in a soubrette role in "The Follies of 1910." She subsequently appeared in vaudeville in a few musical sketches, written and produced by Gus Edwards. When she took up the art of acting for motion pictures, two years ago, she, in her own words, "again had the pleasure of playing with Mrs. Maurice and Mr. Costello."

Miss Walker has become a feature in Vitagraphy and she has a host of admirers in the moving picture world. Both exhibitors and audiences look for her appearance on the screen with anticipatory delight.

Incidentally it should not be overlooked that Miss Walker is to be the Queen of the Mardi Gras at Coney Island this year. The King of the Carnival will be no other than our genial friend, John Bunny, with whom she has appeared so frequently in the film productions of the Vitagraph studio. It may easily be conjectured from the expression of mirth in Miss Walker's features that when she laughs the world laughs with her.

Mr. F. E. Mortimer has announced the opening of his new photoplay theatre in the Warren Block, Freeport, Maine, on September 9th. The theatre is equipped with fireproof booth, illuminated exits, fire escapes, ladies' reception-room, gents' smoking-room, steam heat and electric lights, and has complied with all of the rules that govern moving picture theatres.

The Novelty Slide Company has issued a handy reference directory covering all requirements of the exhibitor in lantern slides. Send to Joseph F. Coufal, general manager, 20 East Fourteenth street, New York City, for a copy; it will interest you.

The Regent—reputed to be the most palatial motion picture theatre in the metropolis, and hence, presumably, in the United States—opens the season with the Kinemacolor pictures as a regular feature, and with Famous Players' films. WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT'S PAGE

IN Connersville, Ind., there lives a deaf boy who was a devotee of the moving picture shows. Now, he says, he no longer attends because he cannot stand the talk of the men and women in the pictures. He hears by watching the lips, and he says that some of the people shown on the picture screens are vulgar, and if decent people knew what they said they would stop the show. The Ohio State Journal, a morning newspaper published in Columbus, Ohio, was misled by this ancient story and treated the deaf boy and his assertions in a leading editorial. To quote the Journal: "He says in one picture the women whispered to each other words that he did not suppose women ever used, and in another picture a character who was a young minister used profane language desperately. He says he couldn't stand it and won't go any more. The movement of the lips to this boy is language as plain and distinct as if it was thundered into a good pair of ears. The boy is not mistaken. The bad language was used when the films were made, the performers at the time never supposing that they would be speaking to a deaf mute. Strange experience this, where sound is seen and not heard." We thought that this canard, circulated extensively two years ago by those antagonistic to Cinematography, had been long ago discarded. However, it seems to have been resurrected at this late day. When the story was circulated two years ago, we asked the two deaf mute boys who work in our vicinity as to the plausibility of such a yarn. They ridiculed it. Both are ardent photoplay "fans," and they take their wives and children to see the pictures. "Do you suppose that we would take our wives and children to the picture shows if any such language was customary," one indignantly wrote on a piece of paper. That was two years ago. Last week when the old, old story appeared once more in print we turned to those two deaf mutes. We inquired if in two years they had noticed profane and indecent language on the lips of the actors in silent drama. They said they had not, and they attend the picture theatres three and four times weekly. Moving picture actresses and actors, for the most part, are ladies and gentlemen. They are recruited from the best talent of the legitimate stage nowadays. The deaf mute story was refuted two years ago, and the manufacturers of pictures would never countenance such language, even if members of their cast were addicted to it. Let the deaf boy, of Connersville, Ind., name the pictures in which actors and actresses insult their audiences. We are rather inclined to the suspicion that some energetic newspaper correspondent in Connersville is rehashing some ancient stuff to increase the length of his "correspondence string."

A new and novel use has been found for the motion picture theatre. It is to be used to explore what has been tragically called the port of missing girls. This variety of theatre is thus to be made a medium of wider range than mere amusement or education. It is to be a humanitarian work. In a short time many cities and towns will receive picture slides showing the portrait of pretty Catherine Winters, the young Newcastle, Ind., girl, who disappeared from home. She is to be shown in numerous poses and dresses, all of the pictures obtainable having been secured and copied on slides. These slides are to be sent broadcast and are to be shown in the picture theatres in the hope that some of those who see them will remember the face of the young girl and will give information as to her whereabouts. The idea is more than ingenious. It is eminently practical. Many millions of people in this country attend motion pictures every week, and it is not unlikely that some of them have seen Catherine Winters, if she is still alive. The use of motion picture theatres for such a purpose seems capable of further expansion.

Inauguration of the Ohio State Board of Censorship, for examination of all moving pictures to be shown in the Buckeye Commonwealth, is being awaited with expectancy by the moving picture trade in general. Manufacturers, exchangemen and thousands of exhibitors of the pictures are interested, and are speculating as to the success of the venture. The first appointment to membership on the board, which will consist of three censors, has been announced by Governor Cox and the State Industrial Commission. The first member named is Mrs. Maude Murray Miller, of Columbus, a newspaper woman, a student and a critic. She is well qualified to assume the duties, which will require extended knowledge of the moving picture art, tact and sound judgment. We can assert that Governor Cox and the members of the Industrial Commission are proceeding with care and deliberation in the formation of this new board. They appreciate that there is a division of opinion as to its probable necessity, and they naturally wish the personnel to be one that will incite respect and confidence among those interested in the business. These officials can be depended upon to do their best in selecting censors who are broad-minded and wise. "We wish to protect our people and at the same time protect those who make their livelihood by means of Cinematography," states Governor Cox. We venture to predict that this new board will, in the end, prove of tremendous importance and worth to Cinematography. James M. Cox, former Congressman and newspaper man, has proven the most popular and able chief executive the old Buckeye State has boasted of for, lo, these many years. His first selection for the Board of Censorship can be commended by this writer. The others will probably be equally satisfactory, for Governor Cox and his commission appreciate that this board will prove an innovation in the amusement circles, not only of Ohio, but of the entire United States, and that persons of authoritative standing in moving picture art are essential to a satisfactory completion of the Censorship Board. The salary of each censor will be $1,500 yearly. Each member will be obliged to devote his or her full time to the duties, for it will prove no brief or easy task to carefully adjudge all the moving pictures released in this and other countries and sent into Ohio.

Last Winter the "crook" play had its vogue in Gotham and certain manufacturers of moving pictures felt it incumbent upon them to release numerous playlets dealing with the "fascinating criminal" of the Raffles type. This action dealt a blow to the best interests of the industry, and we were foremost in condemning the "Raffles" type of playlet. Now we are going to volunteer another suggestion—and a wide one. Let the energetic manufacturer who misguidedly asserts that "red blood" and "the punch" are essential to all films, beware of the "White Slave" subject. It is said that plays of "White Slavery" suggestiveness are to be popular in New York City this season. Let us hope that certain manufacturers will not immediately follow suit and turn out films suggestive of "White Slavery." The newspapers have been full of such stories; we have seen where Diggs assaulted a moving picture camera man outside the court room; and we know that it will be a temptation to some to produce pictures dealing with this topic. Discretion is the better part of valor. There is no place on the moving picture screen, popular with women and children, for playlets dealing with "White Slavery" topics. There is enough in this life that is decent and clean without resorting to unpleasant and unwholesome subjects.

A new film manufacturing company made its initial bow to publicity the other day, and it was not given sufficient space in print to our way of thinking. Giles R. Warren, the well-known author and director, together with J. A. Whitman, have contracted to furnish Warners Features with three-reel features. This fact in itself is not so interesting as is the statement that Messrs. Warren and Whitman are to produce a series of Sir Walter Scott's classics. Two years ago we urged the filming of the masterpieces from the pen of "The Wizard of the North." We pointed out the worth and interest to many in Scott's novels, but only recently has there been a noticeable movement started to accurately produce Sir Walter Scott's stories. The Universal Company started out with "Ivanhoe," lightest of Sir Walter's works. Now Mr. Warren announces that "The Lady of the Lake" has just been completed, and the others to be produced are "Rob Roy," "The Monastery," "Guy Mannering" and "Waverley." A very wise selection, and an announcement that promises to add to the uplift and educational value of the moving pictures. Here are plots and stories that will not need the censorship shears; these stories will bring the work of the Scottish master of literature to the hearts and minds of thousands who have never read Scott's novels. Dominie Sampson, Meg Merrilies and the rest are gladly welcomed to the moving picture screen, where they should have paraded long, long ago. We think the popularizing of Scott important, and congratulate Messrs. Warren and Whitman on their venture. Mr. Warren can be depended upon to retain the vital portions of the stories and to present them with proper atmosphere and correct detail.

Kinemacolor recently captured Weber and Fields for the series of "Famous Players at Home," which already includes Lillian Russell, Chauncey Olcott, William Courtney and Eddie Foy. While for twenty years or more "Mike" and "Meyer" have been playfully poking each other in the eye and cheerfully choking each other, they had never "seen themselves as others see them" until the Kinemacolor pictures were projected upon the screen for their benefit. Both laughed heartily.

"By jimminy, this is funny," chuckled Fields.

"Yes," agreed Weber, "but I never realized before what a monkey you make of me."

"SIGN OF THE BLACK LILY" IS CINES MYSTERY STORY

"The Sign of the Black Lily" is the title of the Kleine-Cines release for Tuesday, September 2nd. Essentially, this is a dramatic story, in two reels, combining a delightful tale of adventure with those wonderful stage settings for which Kleine-Cines pictures are famous. How a wary old white-haired favorite of the clubs and drawing-rooms is exposed as the leader of a gang of thieves, how an enterprising detective wormed his way into the foul heart of the most vicious and corrupt organization in all Paris,

SCENE FROM "SIGN OF THE BLACK LILY"

how, by finding secret buttons, walls moved and floors disappeared, revealing strange hiding places of the gang. The valiant fight of the police against overwhelming odds, and the dramatic unmasking of the sleek villain in his own reception-room, crowded with guests, makes a film delightful for its strong situations, condensing acting and clever story.

WINIFRED GREENWOOD

Miss Winifred Greenwood has joined the forces of the American Film Mfg. Company, at Santa Barbara, Cal., as leading lady of the second company. Miss Greenwood has enjoyed a thorough training in the "legitimate," and for a number of years appeared in various companies as leading lady. Her appearance in the popular "Flying A" pictures will be gratifying to her hosts of friends, who have been watching her career with great interest. Her first experience was acquired in vaudeville, when she toured the United States and Canada with the "Kings Carnival" Company. The first speaking part was as ingenue lead in "Zig Zag Alley." From musical comedy she went to melodrama, starring with J. J. Kennedy in the "Midnight Express." She scored big successes in "Sappho" and "Camille" and acquired an enviable popularity throughout the country in various well known stock companies.

This extensive experience makes Miss Greenwood a very versatile leading woman, and she is ranked among the foremost stars of the silent drama. Her favorite pastimes are the popular athletic sports such as riding, swimming, tennis, golf, etc. The key to her phenomenal success is traceable to her innate desire to please her audience.

The United States Film Co., one of the first independent film manufacturing companies in America, has opened a New York office and will specialize in the manufacture of educational and industrial subjects.

This company was organized in Cincinnati, Ohio, five years ago, and was one of the charter members of the old Motion Picture Alliance. The New York office in the Flatiron Building is now the principal office of the company. It is presided over by Arthur N. Smallwood, the company's general manager.

In addition to making educational and industrial subjects, the United States Film Company will undertake to produce dramatic and comedy feature subjects for releasing concerns. It is promised that the company will market an occasional State right picture of its own manufacture.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

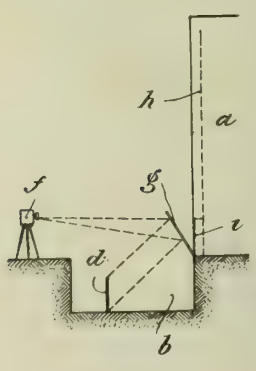
Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

The new rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States, which took effect in February of this year, are aimed to correct some of the abuses which formerly attended patent litigation by making witnesses subject to cross-examination, by requiring testimony to be taken in court, except when both parties otherwise agree, and by subjecting the testimony in these cases to the same rules of evidence commonly in effect, thus excluding irrelevant and otherwise objectionable testimony. These rules, if applied in the proper spirit, should greatly reduce the expense and time for which patent cases were heretofore notorious, and any legislation governing this procedure should not be enacted until it is seen how well these rules work in practice.

Since patent suits upon appeal are heard in one of the nine Federal Circuit Courts of Appeals, whose decision usually is final, a condition has been brought about in which a patent may be valid in one part of the country and not valid in another, owing to the limited jurisdiction of these courts and the fact that their decisions may not be harmonious. The remedy for this is a single court of patent appeals with jurisdiction covering the entire country to whom appeals should be taken from the trial court.

The appointment of an independent non-partisan commission to make a thorough study of the entire patent situation and its needs, and investigate the operation of the patent systems in use in other countries, and report to Congress before any legislation whatever is passed upon this subject, is most desirable. Greater liberality upon the part of Congress in the matter of appropriations for the Patent Office, would help materially in facilitating business therewith, and would be a benefit to inventors and manufacturers, and hence to the public generally. Why not use some of the $8,000,000 dollars that patentees have piled up in the U. S. Treasury to the credit of the Patent Office, to render the latter capable of handling its vast business promptly and effectually? To the inventor time is more than money, and delay is often disastrous.

A method of synchronizing a visual performance and an acoustic accompaniment therefor, which consists in photographing on a film the performance of the actors, and in simultaneously photographing on said film a reflected front view of a person facing the actors and directing the acoustic accompaniment of the performance, is the subject matter of Patent No. 1,069,221, issued to Jakob Beck, of Munich, Germany. In the accompanying diagram a is the stage, on which the actors perform; b the orchestra pit; d the bandmaster and f the recording camera, placed in the auditorium. For obtaining a front view of the bandmaster looking toward the stage, a mirror g is mounted at a suitable point of the stage, in which the image of the bandmaster will be reflected. When therefore the view on the stage is photographed by the camera f the bandmaster will appear on the finished picture as if seen from in front. His image may then be projected against the lower part of the screen h, which is then, if the projection is made from behind the screen, covered by a partition i; the photograph may, however, also be made in such a manner that the bandmaster is shown on the side of the film and is accordingly projected. By such means the persons producing the acoustic accompaniment of the kinematographic display (actors, singers, musicians and the like) who are placed during the performance behind the screen h are in a position to exactly follow the directing movements of the bandmaster and to begin at the proper moments and accompany the play in the proper time, as the speed of the movements of the directing person will now vary with the varying speed of the film. The whole performance will thereby receive a uniform character, both in the play and the accompaniment, and the artistic requirements can be met in a better manner than was hitherto possible.



New York State averages about one-sixth of all patents issued, Illinois and Pennsylvania representing about one-tenth each of the total issue from week to week. Among foreign nations Germany is usually in the lead, with England a good second, and Canada a poor third.

MAREY apparatus for analyzing movements has recently been noticed in the Illustrated London News, which remarks that such a splitting-up of motions, it seems almost superfluous to point out, is of very considerable value, quite apart from the interest it provides for the merely curious. The man of science comparing the human animal with others; the doctor studying the human body; the anatomist; the artist who works from life, all cannot fail to give thanks to the inventor of a device which enables the human eye to see details it is impossible for it to see in the ordinary way. We quote: "A movement is visualized by man, as it were, roughly; for the simple reason that images are retained for an appreciable time on the retina, and so, under our conditions of vision, merge into one another and make a whole as we know it, just as the separate images in the old zoetrope blended when the wheel was turned with sufficient speed. The same fact is the basis of the moving picture, in which image merging into image gives the impression of continuous movement; but the moving picture cannot be said to analyze movement really to any great extent, unless the pictures be shown very slowly. The Marey apparatus permits the taking of moving pictures slowly and on a single plate, so that the movements, instead of being photographed so many times in a second that when they are shown in very rapid succession on a screen they appear as they do to the human eye in the ordinary way, are photographed at a so much lower rate of speed that they divide a given movement—such as a jump over the vaulting-horse—into, say, half a dozen parts. The results are of very special value, and this is not lessened by the reminder that, of course, each photograph shows but one person.

An electric arc light obtained from materials which afford such a large proportion of ultraviolet rays as to apparently give no light at all, is a practical application of modern abstract science for the exposure of many frauds, such as imitation precious stones and other fakes. As is well known ultraviolet rays are common to sunlight as well as the arc light, but are not visible to the human eye under ordinary conditions. In the use of the electric arc above referred to, all but the ultraviolet rays are eliminated by means of suitable screens. When the rays thus segregated impinge on an object they make it glow to a greater or less degree. If, for instance, it is desired to test the genuineness of stones represented to be diamonds the operator first learns how a diamond glows in these rays and then compares the glow shown by the stones in question. Thus very definite results are possible with a large number of substances.

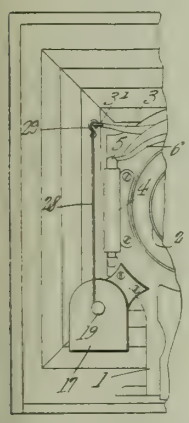
The accompanying drawing represents a front elevation of a portion of a camera with an attachment applied thereto whereby the shutter may be actuated at a certain time desired by the operator, giving the latter an opportunity to pose for the picture before the actual exposure—the attachment being the invention of Gerfield A. Roberts, of Olathe, Kan.; Patent No. 1,069,293. 1 designates the front slide of the camera carrying lens tube 2; 3 the shutter lever adapted to be released by air directed under pressure into the cylinder 4, motion being transmitted from the piston 5 to the shutter mechanism, by means of lever 6. A casing 17 secured to slide 1, has a shaft journaled therein and projecting forwardly therefrom, there being a knob 19 upon the front end of the shaft whereby it can be readily rotated. The casing 17 encloses a clock spring escapement movement. A cord 28 is secured at one end to the knob 18 and to the finger piece 3^1 by a hook 29. The shaft is rotated by means of knob 19 to wind the escapement spring and the connection 28 is unwrapped from the shaft and hook 29 placed in engagement with lever 3, it being understood that this lever is first set. As soon as the knob 19 is released, the connection 28 will bewound upon the shaft, slowly pulling downwardly on the lever 3 until the shutter mechanism is released. This mechanism can be so timed as to cause the actuation of the shutter after any desired period of time has elapsed, this adjustment being most readily effected by varying the length of the connection 28.



Photographs on copper having a delicate daguerreotypic effect are the result of a recently developed process, in which a polished plate is exposed to chlorine gas for a few seconds to produce a sensitive layer which is exposed under a negative for ten minutes in sunlight, sufficient to produce the positive, which may be then readily set by a toning-fixing bath containing but little hyposulphite but charged with silver salts. For this purpose a bath may be used that has been previously employed in paper-toning; and the sensitive layer on the surface of the copper should be extremely thin, as a thick layer is found to be less sensitive. Heretofore attempts have been made to utilize the sensitiveness of cuprous salts to light, but the images could not be fixed, because ordinary-reagents dissolve copper salts, whether affected or unaffected by light, in about the same manner.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of The Moving Picture News.

"Les Miserables" in Nine Reels

A great French company has produced Hugo's "Les Miserables," with every detail of the wonderful story. One need never have read the book to understand thoroughly and appreciate, it is said.

A wonderful cast of French players posed before the cameras for the production. Henri Krauss, of the Theatre Sarah Bernhardt; Mlle. Ventura, of the Theatre De l'Odeon; La Petit Fromet, of the Theatre du Vaudeville; Mons. Etievant, of the Theatre de LaPorte and other stars from the most famous theatres in France will be seen in the principal parts. The stage mountings are natural. The scenes have been taken in the exact spots described by Hugo, when he wrote his novel in 1862. Some of the original places remain and in these places the scenes as told in the story have been enacted.

There are nine reels in the production. This means more than 10,000 feet of imported film. The production will run two hours and a quarter, with the intermissions. The picture has not yet been seen in New York.

Ripley D. Saunders, the eminent dramatic critic of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, wrote a column in review of the picture, something that is absolutely unprecedented in that city so far as motion pictures go.—Birmingham (Ala.) News.

William "Kinemacolor" Hickey, the "circulating medium" of the Allied Kinemacolor companies, is in New York after a flying trip of Europe. He brings with him the films of "William Tell," taken in the Swiss Alps; "Robin Hood," filmed in Sherwood Forest, England; 'Mary Magdalene," with Mme. Maeterlinck in the title rôle, and some marvelous Oriental scenes taken by a Kinemacolor expert who spent a year in China and Japan.

The Selig Polyscope Company has purchased from Nell Shipman her prize-winning scenario, "Outwitted by Billy," which will have an early production.

Iowa Falls, Ia.—C. C. Frie, Eldora, has purchased a lot in Brookings, S. D., and will commence in a few weeks the erection of a modern theatre building.

THE GRECIAN VASE (Sept. 2).—In the window of an antique shop there once stood a Greek vase which meant more to Giulio, a poor sculptor who lived nearby, than anything else in the world. On the case was the figure of a woman skilfully executed in the graceful, frozen beauty of the Greek convention. Giulio was in love with the vase and in love with the woman upon it. He could never pass by the shop window without stopping to gaze with longing eyes at the beautiful creation of the master workmen of a dead age.

One day an unusually stringent state of finances forced Giulio to take a little statue on which he had devoted many hours of careful labor to the antique shop in the hope of selling it. Inside the shop he paused to pay his daily tribute of admiration to the vase. As he turned away the end of the statue which he carried hit the vase and knocked it to the floor, where it shattered into a thousand pieces. The indignant clerk, discovering that Giulio was penniless, insisted on taking the statue in return for the broken vase. Giulio took the broken pieces and went sadly back to the attic.

On one little fragment of the base the face of the woman was still preserved in all its former beauty. Giulio gazed on it yearningly and fell into a deep reverie. It seemed to him that he was living in the first springtime of the world, when nymphs and satyrs danced in every field and grove. He saw the woman of the vase in the midst of a laughing throng of dancing dryads and followed her over hill and dale while the mystic pipes of Pan filled the air with a music as intoxicating as old wine.

The dream was the turning point of Giulio's fortunes, for he awoke from it to find a letter, from the manager of the antique shop, informing him that his statue was worth many times the value of the broken vase. Moreover, so strongly did the vision affect Giulio that he wrought, in living marble, a statue of the dream woman that made him famous.

GAUMONT

THE FATAL BELL (Sept. 2).—George Harland, cashier at the Northwestern Bank, Northville, has a brother of sporting proclivities—Maurice is a keen backer of horses. Like most bettors Maurice loses heavily, but one day he receives news of a "dead cinch," and decides to surreptitiously borrow a large sum from George's bank and to repay the sum out of his winnings-to-be. Maurice calls on the unsuspecting George, and, taking advantage of the position of trust his brother holds in the institution, he abstracts a wad of notes while George's back is turned, and gets safely away with the cash.

Balancing time comes round and George Harland is found to be $2,500 short in his cash. The distracted cashier is haled before the manager and accused of embezzling the bank's funds, being given grace until 5 that evening to make good the deficiency. George is bewildered, aghast, and almost stunned by the blow, and goes home in a state bordering upon insanity. His wife tries to sympathize, but George is beyond all sympathy, the shock has been too terrible. He announces that when the police come to arrest him—when the doorbell rings at 5 o'clock—he will shoot himself rather than submit to the disgrace and ignominy of an accusation of this kind. Mrs. Harland, at her wits' end to circumvent George's crazy decision, cuts down the bell from the door, and lays it on the sideboard, hoping that as time passes her husband will recover his equanimity.

Smitten with remorse, and fearing the consequences which would react upon his brother, Maurice goes back to the bank, and makes a clean breast of the theft to the manager, who thereupon hands him a note exonerating George from all blame in the matter. Maurice arrives at his brother's home prepared to confess the crime to George, and Mrs. Harland is explaining the situation when little Doris Harland, just returned from school, espies the bell and promptly seizes it and makes a loud clanging. Instantly a loud shot is heard reverberating through the house, and Mrs. Harland fears that the worst has happened in the room wherein George has locked himself.

On breaking open the door George Harland is found to have severely wounded himself, although not fatally, and on hearing his brother's confession he is devoutly thankful that his aim was not accurate.

SOME FIREMAN (Sept. 4).—Oscar Bingham believes he is the only pebble on the beach so far as Mamie Devere, the popular musical comedy actress, is concerned, but one morning an anonymous letter from "A Friend" causes him most furiously to think—and act. Can this accusation of flightiness directed against his darling Mamie have any foundation in truth? He will investigate the matter forthwith.

Evening arrived, Oscar dons his "glad rags" and hies him to the Imperial Theatre, and when he goes round on to the stage to visit Mamie at the end of the first act, the actions of his beloved seem to lend color to the accusations of Oscar's anonymous correspondent. But Oscar must be sure. And this is where his brainwave occurs. He bribes the theatre fireman to change places (and clothes) with him, and while impersonating the doughty flame-quencher sees quite enough to quench his own flames of love.

An interview with the fire chief (during the course of which Oscar gives him an involuntary shower-bath), and an ignominious finish in the "cooler," leave Oscar in a considerably chastened frame of mind—so chastened that he vows never to chase after musical comedy satellites for the future.

AMERICAN

THE MYSTERIOUS EYES (Sept. 6).—Richard Frawley, who lives with his daughter on a ranch, sells his property and is paid for it in currency. As they are in a rough country, he places the money in a belt about his person and they decide to start for the East at once. In order to make their train, as they are a long way from the station, they are obliged to spend a night at McGovern's Inn, a rough Western place. McGovern hears of the sale of the ranch, also that Frawley has money with him and that they are to spend a night at the inn. He decides to watch them and find where the old man keeps his money. For this purpose he has a picture so arranged that from the next room he can look through the eyes of the picture and watch his victims.

Frawley and his daughter arrive and are given this room; the daughter sees the glittering eyes in the picture, but does not betray it, although she is terrified. She makes an excuse to leave the room, writes a short note to her father, which she manages to slip into his hand unobserved, telling him of the eyes and for him to feign illness; that she will take the money on her person and ostensibly ride for a doctor.

She does this, as McGovern is very glad to have her out of the way; although he has watched her carefully, he has not seen the girl take the money belt. After she has gotten safely away, the father, who has feigned sleep, wakes up; tells McGovern his daughter has taken his money. McGovern immediately starts in pursuit of the girl; the father is thus enabled to make his escape, which he does, and joins his daughter at a place they have agreed upon, and where they can take the midnight train.

McGovern, who has gone first to the doctor's office, finds that the girl has not been there, thinks about the midnight train, and rides over there just in time to see the train pull out with his victims aboard.

FOR THE CROWN (Sept. 8).—Following the first Adventures of Jacques, the King, repentant of his insult to the church, again embraces the faith and, shortly after falling ill, he dies.

The second adventure opens with the funeral procession of the late King, the Crown Prince being in the procession that carries the remains of the late monarch to the royal tomb.

The following day the coronation of the child King takes place in the throne room of the palace. The Bishop advances with the crown, but the child, already imperious in his authority, demands that none other than his beloved friend Jacques le Grand shall place the crown. His wishes are acceded to.

In the meantime the Duke de Montserrat continues his intrigue with the Queen, but the death of the King has awakened her mother love, and when he suggests that together they rule the country, she replies: "The past is dead! The future is for the King." Failing in this attempt to secure the throne through marriage with the Queen's mother, the Duke incites the nobles to revolt against the King. With the assistance of the infuriated nobles of the court the palace is stormed and the King kidnapped.

Jacques le Grand has been inactive, preferring to remain at the court and bask in the smiles of Constance, who has won his heart. The Queen, distracted, sends for him and tells of the outrage. Recalling the vow to his father, who had admonished him, "Be ready to lay down your life for the King," he buckles on his sword and promises, "I will save the King or die for him." Constance overhears and decides to accompany him. Securing the costume of a page she joins the young adventurer, and together they go in search for the King.

Far from the palace the robber nobles carry the King and place him in the home of some peasants in the mountains. The imperious King warns them, "You will repent this when I come back!" The King is hustled into the hut and guarded by the peasants.

In the meantime Jacques and Constance encounter the nobles at the inn, and when they make overtures of friendship he seemingly falls in with their plans to gain his purpose. But one of the nobles unobserved places a sleeping powder in Constance's tankard, and Constance indiscreetly drinks therefrom. When Jacques notes what has befallen his beloved Constance his anger is aroused, and, pulling her up on the table beside him, he draws his rapier and fights them all. They are about to overpower him when with one sweep of his arm he breaks the window, and leaping, he escapes with Constance to safety.

The young King wanders from his guard with the child of the latter and makes his way into the mountains. The escape is discovered, and the peasants, alarmed, hurry to notify the Duke.

In the meantime Jacques and Constance have resumed their search for the King, and the Duke encounters them after learning of the escape of the King. He attempts to kill Jacques and Constance takes up the fight in his stead. She is disarmed, and Jacques, being found only wounded, they are carried to the prison and placed in cells.

A week later Jacques recovered from his wounds, and Constance, having bribed a jailer, secures a file in a loaf of bread, and filing through the bars, descends to Jacques' cell. Here the work is repeated and they soon make their escape.

At the palace the Duke, secure in his villainy and believing that the King had perished from hunger in the mountains, with the assistance of the revolting nobles plans for his coronation.

But Jacques and Constance have found the King and are hurrying to the palace with the true monarch. The Duke with his nobles enter the throne room, with the Queen and those true to the King protesting. He approaches the throne, and raising the crown, is about to proclaim himself King, when Jacques and Constance enter with the King after their furious ride, and Jacques, rapier in hand, rushes at the imposter and runs him through. Then placing the King on the throne, he compels the nobles to swear allegiance to the crown, and, kneeling to the King, receives his reward.

TRUE FEATURE

THE HEART OF THE HUNCHBACK (3 Reels).—This story is based upon a sensational thrilling episode of the war now raging in the southwestern part of Europe. It serves to introduce the modern types of military aeroplanes and shows the most modern of these many hundred feet above the earth engaged in a combat with regular troops, a struggle ending in the fall and destruction of the aeroplane. The central figure in the story is that of a hunchback, which is played with extraordinary skill. The hunchback is enraged at his rejection by the belle of the village and thinking to revenge himself on her and her lover, he betrays his country. To head off the consequences of the treason, Jeritza, the village belle, makes a heartbreaking ride to the headquarters of her own troops. The commanding general at once mobilizes his aeroplanes and there is an encounter with the enemy. The hunchback repents of his treason and defying the enemies of his country, pays the penalty of his heroism with his life.

VITAGRAPH

THE LONELY PRINCESS (Sept. 4).—Ione, the only daughter of Prince Rafaello, an impoverished nobleman whose house in Venice is fast falling into decay, greatly feels the poverty to which the family has been reduced. She is too poor to mingle with her own class but too proud to seek companionship with any other. Watched over by a garrulous but very strict chaperon, the Countess de Sali, the girl leads a lonely life, the more so because her father spends most of his time in Rome. Ione keeps a diary in which she records her innermost thoughts, her longing for companionship and love and her wish for an adventure to relieve the tedious monotony of her existence.

Franklin Endicott, a young American millionaire spending part of his vacation in Venice, one day sees her on the balcony as he is passing along the canals in a gondola. He falls in love with her and that night returns to serenade her. Ione, who is greatly flattered by this attention, such as she has never received before, throws him a rose, which he places next to his heart.

Endicott makes inquiries and finds out who the young lady is, and at once sets out to obtain an introduction to her father. Hearing that he is in Rome, the young man goes there and easily makes his acquaintance.

Ione dreams that the young man becomes her lover, who takes her away from the life which she hates so much, and is greatly disappointed when she no longer sees him pass her house. Receiving a letter from her father saying that he is returning bringing with him a young American millionaire, whom he wishes her to marry, she is almost heartbroken and determines to resist the marriage at all costs. When she finds that the young millionaire is none other than Endicott, she is happy once more. Her dream has come true.

LUBIN

SEEDS OF WEALTH (Sept. 8).—Aline Maxwell, a pretty young seamstress, is the sole support of her invalid father. She finds regular work in the household of John Lavino, a wealthy attorney, most of which is confined to making dresses for Emily, the four-year-old daughter of the Lavinos. Little Emily is very fond of Aline, loving her in her childish way as though she were her own mother. Mrs. Lavino discovers, to her discomfiture, that Aline is in love with her son, Ralph, a young attorney in business with his father. She orders Ralph to give up any intentions of marrying Aline. Ralph refuses. Mrs. Lavino then tells Aline that she must discontinue her work in their household. Aline leaves, heartbroken. That Ralph may not know why she left, she tells him that she does not love him. Deprived of her source of income, she rapidly drifts into a state bordering upon poverty. Little Emily's love for Aline never wavers. The daughter of the wealthy folks pays surreptitious visits to the humble home of Aline and her father, adjoining the Lavino mansion. A valuable diamond necklace, the property of Mrs. Lavino, is discovered missing a few days later. Aline has been seen alone in the room where the necklace is kept. She is suspected by Mrs. Lavino. Detectives are sent to her home, where the missing diamonds are found embedded in the earth contained in a row of flower pots on Aline's window sill. This is considered proof positive that the seamstress is the guilty party. She is arrested, but secures bail through Ralph, who, in spite of the emphatic objections of his parents, announces his intention of acting as Aline's lawyer. At the trial the damaging circumstantial evidence against Aline is being delivered to the jury by the prosecuting attorney, when Emily, divining by childish intuition that her beloved Aline is in trouble, interrupts the trial proceedings. The little girl then tells how she had taken her mother's necklace and had planted the diamonds in the flower pots in Aline's home. She had been told that diamonds were "seeds of wealth," and in her childish way had thought that if they were planted trees of money would grow from them, and thus relieve Aline from her poverty. Aline is immediately exonerated and her engagement to Ralph is finally sanctioned by the Lavinos.

HARD LUCK BILL (Sept. 4).—Bill Jones is in arrears with Mrs. Swatt, his landlady, and she tells him to produce the money or leave. He borrows ten dollars from his next-door neighbor, Tom. Bill sees the landlady enter with a stunning-looking girl, and in order to make a hit helps himself to Tom's new suit of clothes. He manages to meet the young lady as she is leaving the house and invites her to luncheon. When he comes to pay for it he discovers that he left the money in his own clothes. In the meantime, Mrs. Swatt, in a rage at not receiving her rent, throws Bill's clothes out the window and they are picked up by a tramp. Bill comes back for the money, finds his clothes gone and the landlady hales him to the police station. The girl is also taken to the station and a general mix-up ensues, which is settled by the appearance on the scene of the tramp with Bill's clothes and the ten-dollar bill.

That evening Whiffles is playing billiards when the fateful hour arrives. He drops his cue, but a friend persuades him to stay longer, and when he does go home to assert himself in terms that will leave no question as to his being the boss. Two hours late, Whiffles reaches home and puts his friend's theory into practice, but Mrs. Whiffles upsets it so thoroughly that Whiffles with a weapon in each hand seeks the giver of false advice, but to his further sorrow meets the man's wife instead.

IN THE CAUCASIAN MOUNTAINS.—A short film which is a tour of the beautiful Caucasian Mountains, showing the famous Krasnaia Polana causeway, which is followed by a view of the source of the River Narzan, known and loved by the thousands of Polish immigrants who still call its banks their home. The ruins of the ancient city of Afon are also disclosed, and the film concludes with a vista down the beautiful Cypress Lane.

THE CLIMAX (Sept. 3).—The greatest sorrow in the life of Jane Summers is her brother Joe's devotion to a life of crime. Jane, realizing the hopelessness of reforming him, resumes her occupation of trained nurse in a hospital. One of the first patients she is cast to care for is Walter Briggs, who, she learns, has been shot by her brother. Through her zealous attention Briggs recovers and a short time later they are married. All goes well with the couple until Joe, learning of the marriage, visits his sister to borrow money. Joe is threatening her when Briggs, shotgun in hand, returns from a shooting trip. Joe makes his way to a boat, but Briggs, recognizing him only as the man who shot him, fires at the fugitive, and Joe's career as a criminal is brought to a climax.

FICKLE FORTUNE'S FAVOR (Sept. 4).—Weary Willie has a lone dollar and a fearful appetite. He decides to part with a portion of his riches for a sandwich, but even as he lays down the bill a fickle breeze wafts it away. Willie and the sandwich seller give chase, ever near the money but never quite reaching it. The chase takes them to Coney Island, where they pursue the elusive dollar through the many laugh-provoking devices for which the resort is famous. But the dollar evidently was not meant for them, as it never ceased its flight until it rested in the lap of a millionaire riding in his six-cylinder car.

THE OTTER (Sept. 5).—This film offers a subject which is at one and the same time entertaining and educational. The otter builds its home in the ground on the banks of a stream where large fish are numerous. A peculiar trait of the otter is to seize by the head the fish it preys upon, and it has an amusing difficulty telling the head from the tail of an eel. The otter's fur is of great value, and for that reason the animal is relentlessly pursued by trappers, and the method of his capture is aptly illustrated. The perfect photography and hand-coloring of the film make it additionally attractive as an educational offering.

On the same reel:

IN THE ABRUZZI, ITALY.—A film that, added to its own beauty, has the charm of color photography. It deals with a section of Sunny Italy which is famous for its splendid views, which are shown, and besides this the film covers the industries, types and costumes of the natives, closing with a display of very original ideas in hairdressing.

THE PRICE OF JEALOUSY (Sept. 6).—Rose and Ida, sisters, decide to visit an Indian camp and for safety's sake they disguise themselves as men. Bill Hart, a cowboy, who accompanies the sisters on the trip, is in love with Rose, and Ida is so jealous that she informs the Indians that Rose is not a man as she appears. The Indians steal Rose away, but that night remorse overtakes her, and she pays the price of her jealousy.

PLEASING HER HUSBAND (Sept. 9).—Mr. Green tries to instil high ideals into his wife, but to no avail, she preferring to remain plain and hardworking. When Mr. and Mrs. Brown pay them a visit, and Pearl is still washing the dishes in the kitchen, Mr. Green, after looking at Mrs. Brown and admiring her rich clothes and lordly bearing, scolds his wife for not being the same. Pearl determines to change her mode of living. She invests all of her savings in swell clothes and hires a cook. That evening she leaves a note for Green, telling him that she is dining at the Browns', and asking him to call for her. She informs him that Mary, the new cook, will prepare his supper for him. Green has a fight with Mary, and after throwing pots and pans at him she quits. Green prepares his own meal and then goes to the Browns'. He is surprised to find Pearl dressed in the height of fashion and looking really beautiful and alluring. She is the center of attraction and is admired by all the men, who persist in being attentive to her, much to Green's annoyance. At last, being no longer able to control his jealousy, he insists upon Pearl accompanying him home. They go, and he is further surprised when he finds that Pearl has accepted his advice about being like Mrs. Brown and ordered a cab for herself. Green refuses to speak to his wife until the next morning, when she appears as her old self in an old wrapper and serves him his breakfast, whereupon he determines that he likes her best that way and tells her so.

for the better. He finds a basket of lunch that a workingman left and has his first meal in days. He next picks up a cigar butt and is about to smoke it when a gentleman passes and gives him a good cigar. He walks in the park, and from a passing automobile espies a suitcase fall therefrom. He picks it up and, finding it full of clothes, decks himself out in high-class and brand new raiment. Walking along a street he passes a window, and the wind is blowing a twenty-dollar bill out; it falls in Happy's hat. He kisses the horseshoe and vows never to part with it. He goes into a swell restaurant and has a good feed. He emerges and sees a tough assaulting a young woman. He rescues her, and while she thanks him the tough vows vengeance. Happy walks along and the tough gets one of his cronies and pounces on him. They are beating him up when he pulls out his horseshoe for luck. A policeman hails in sight and chases all three. Happy, still believing in the horseshoe, hides, and the policeman passes him and arrests the other two. Happy resolves that his horseshoe has brought him some luck and determines to be respectable.

FRONTIER

DORATHEA AND CHIEF RAZAMATAZ (Sept. 11).—It has been generally conceded to be unwise for a father to refuse his consent for his daughter to have a sweetheart if the said sweetheart can be proven to be a fairly good specimen of manhood. Particularly when the girl has arrived at a sensible age and really knows what she wants. A chaperon, therefore, becomes to the lovers a nuisance good and proper.

In our story the mother having died some years before and the father being compelled to travel considerably, considered it advisable to employ a chaperon for his daughter Dorathea. He gave the chaperon strict instructions not to allow Walter Rodgers, a young man very much smitten with Dorathea, around the premises while he was away, and about the first thing that happened after the father went away was a meeting between the two. The chaperon tries to do her duty faithfully and sends the young man about his business.

Later they plan to elope. The father is now on his way home and stops off at Albuquerque and buys an Indian blanket as a present for Dorathea. He arrives hime just in time to prevent the elopement, and when questioned by the young man why he refuses his consent to their marriage, he gets an idea when he sees the blanket, and tells a falsehood. He tells Walter that he has promised Dorathea to a chief in the West called Razamataz and that Razamataz has sent this blanket to Dorathea as a token of homage. He chases Walter from the premises.

He takes his daughter West with him on his next trip. Walter gets wind of it and follows on the same train. Later, when they reach New Mexico and journey to Whitcomb Springs, Walter follows and, securing the services of some cowboys, conceives the idea of masquerading as Chief Razamataz, kidnap the girl, and if the father objects to explain to the father that he is the Indian chief come for white squaw. The plan is executed properly and the girl captured. Walter explains his deception of masquerading to Dorathea. The father, with two assistants, has hurried to the rescue of Dorathea. The two assistants are frightened away by the Indians, but the father is held as a prisoner. He agrees to the marriage, hardly knowing whether he is dreaming or not. He is caught at his own game. The justice of the peace ties the knot. The father is compelled to shake hands with the supposed chief, and in so doing sees the white arm of Walter protruding from the sleeve, which is a strong contrast to the Indian war paint. He smells a mouse and knocks off the Indian wig. He admits his defeat and accepts the inevitable and all ends happily.

THE GIRL RANCHERS (Sept. 12).—Mrs. Houston and her daughters in an Eastern city receive an unexpected telegram from the West informing them of their heritage of "Rough Neck Ranch," together with inquiry as to its management. In spite of Mrs. Houston's protests, her daughters decide to manage their own ranch, and promptly wire information to that effect. The foreman, upon receipt of the message, reports the unexpected outcome to the punchers, who give utterance in chorus "That no darn skirt bosses the ranch."

In the meantime Mrs. Houston and her daughters, having prepared for leaving, duly arrive at a small Western station, where they are saluted by several rounds of ammunition, piled into a buckboard and driven to "Rough Neck Ranch."

Mrs. Houston finds things rather untidy and proceeds to adjust them in accordance with her feminine tastes. Having learned the art of fine pastry and fudge, she gives a sample of her pies to Lee, who is immediately transformed into an ardent admirer.

After a few days a general change is in evidence throughout the ranch, which has been renamed "Maidens' Rest." The arrival of other girl friends adds to the befitting of its new christening. The punchers, unable to tolerate the female monarchs, openly rebel. The girls in answer to their demand stick up their noses and prepare to care for the ranch duties themselves. The punchers amusingly watch their preparations in various undertakings.

In the meantime the Indians, in accordance with their habit, have gone upon the warpath, and happen upon "The Maidens' Rest." Finding no male opposition, they immediately prepare to carry off the would-be strike-breakers, who for the first time give utterance in their prayers for "man," which is promptly answered by the arrival of the punchers, who put the Indians to flight.

A fuller consideration as to the need and uses of "man" having been deeply manifested, an inseparable unit becomes apparent between both species at "Rough Neck," alias "Maidens' Rest" Ranch.

THE DIAMOND MAKERS (2 Reels) (Sept. 11).—Bhadon, an aged alchemist, actuated by the decree of Buddha that in America the secret of making artificial diamonds would be discovered, gives his life to the cause and succeeds.

Elated at his titanic success, and that through the medium of inexhaustible finances the restoration of the ancient teachings of Buddha might again thrive, Bhadon sends his trusted Hindoo servant to the High Priest in India, pleading that Shedah might be spared to assist in disposing of the product.

Shedah, the powerful emissary for the cause, is dispatched with her two bodyguards to American soil, where through her wiles and marvelous beauty she is enabled to effect sale after sale to the wealthy.

This mysterious flooding of the American market with gems of astonishing brilliancy and value alarm to a marked degree the Kimberly interests, who controlled this outlet. Their own ceaseless efforts ineffective, they are prompted to retain the services of Felix Westerly, the famous American detective, to learn the source.

Westerly, after carefully laid plans, runs upon a clew, and with the help of his silent assistants runs to earth the girl Shedah. His hardest task follows, for she is eternally guarded by her two Hindoo "shadows," whose sagacity and stealth for a time far outdistance even his most subtle plans. It is only through his double, disguised to represent himself, that he is enabled to shadow Shedah to the secret laboratory where the alchemist manufactures the diamonds.

The discovery of this secret rendezvous barely misses a fatality far Detective Westerly. He is discovered as he views the laboratory with its profusion of chemical and electrical furnaces and paraphernalia. A gigantic Hindoo engages him in mortal conflict; the desperate battle is carried to the roof, where Westerly, exhausted and bleeding, secures a hold which permits him to throw his persistent adversary from the roof, where he falls to high-voltage wires and meets a horrible death.

Hindoo, warned by the sound of strife, totally destroy the laboratory with all its secrets and for the time being elude the officers stationed by Westerly and successfully escape.

The determined Westerly, goaded by his temporary failure, traces the Hindoo party to another seaport town through the aid of his powerful system of inspectors, and again the quest for strategic supremacy reigns. The trio is at length rounded up at a great society ball, but repeat their reputation for daring and escape. They are traced to their own yacht and captured, having availed themselves of secret panels to confuse the detectives and officers who followed.

Westerly reports to the Kimberly interest the ending of the quest, as the inventor, the aged alchemist, commits suicide rather than reveal the secret prompted by his desire to aid in the revival of Buddhism.

THE GOLD MESH BAG (Sept. 8).—Harry Manning is the son of a fashionable family, but on account of financial reverses is compelled to earn his own living. Through the assistance of an old friend he obtains the position of a floor-walker in a large department store. The employer, a very wealthy man, has a daughter who falls in love with Harry, and pursues him, but he, from the serene height of his aristocratic lineage, looks askance at her. She hits on a fine idea. By hook or by crook she obtains a photo of him, also one of herself, has a double print made showing them both on the same card, with herself in an adoring attitude. This wonderful scheme fails in its intent, and even makes him more distant than ever, so the poor girl is at her wits' end. Another wondrous scheme takes root in Ethel's mind, whereby she can obtain her heart's desire. She conspires with two friends to impersonate two sneak thieves. They are to come to the store, steal from her a gold mesh bag in such a manner that Harry can see and capture them. This she hopes will bring him closer to her. This preposterous idea works out exactly opposite her wishes. The pseudo thieves sneak the bag, but are seen by someone else. In order to make their getaway in the excitement they pop the bag in the side pocket of the unsuspecting Harry. The bag is found in Harry's pocket, he is accused, and about to be arrested, when Ethel breaks down and confesses that it was all a joke instituted by her. She is forgiven by her dad. Harry is promoted, and at a birthday party, given in her honor, Harry presents to her another mesh bag, containing an engagement ring. She joyously accepts, her father gives his consent, and the joke that at one time seemed likely to terminate in a tragedy made two hearts beat as one, and two souls with but a single thought.

BINKS ELEVATES THE STAGE (Sept. 13).—Poor little Binks is now an actor and loves the leading lady, who coquettishly encourages him while she really adores Maurice Mt. Chessington, the handsome leading man. One night while Binks is dressed as a convict and behind prison bars he sees the leading lady and the accursed Maurice Mt. Chessington embracing off the stage. This maddens him and he drops his character and shakes his fist at them. The manager gives him a kick and Binks, jumping with pain, knocks down the scenery on the leading man's head, and they have a rough-and-tumble fight with the fire buckets and everything else that they can seize, and Binks ends the combat by knocking the matinee idol into the bass drum. He is senseless, and Binks, thinking he has killed him, runs from the theatre, followed by the actors in costume and the audience. He is dressed as a convict, and the numbers of the pursuers grow. He dodges them and they give up the chase. A runaway convict is nearby, and old Skeggins, the village miser, has covetously wished for the reward. He spies the convict stripes of Binks in the wood, and calling two husky farmhands, he superintends the capture of Binks, and as the train does not go until morning they lock him in the icehouse. The next day he is taken out rather stiff and carried to the depot, where the manager recognizes him. Binks is restored and thrashes his captors and gets on the train and leaves with the company.

VICTOR

A BRIDE FROM THE SEA (Sept. 12).—Gertrude lives with her uncle, who is rough, uncouth, and treats her unkindly. Jim, a river pirate and thief, comes with his boat. He is taken with Gertrude, and she is so unhappy with her uncle that she is glad of his attention. He proposes that she elope with him, which she does, and they sail away in Jim's boat. In the morning Gertrude implores Jim to take her ashore to a minister, that they may be married, but Jim refuses. He sails away from the town at which they anchored.

While Jim and his crew are drunk Gertrude escapes in a small boat. She endures great hardships, but finally reaches the shore.

She is found at dawn by some fishermen, but has suffered a lapse of memory, and can tell nothing of her past life. A minister, who is called to the scene, takes Gertrude home to his mother.

Gertrude helps the minister in his work among the fisherfolks, and in time they are married. One day Jim's boat puts in at the village. A subscription has been taken up to build a new church. The minister takes the money home with him. One of Jim's men sees this and tells him. That night Jim goes to rob the minister. He is discovered by Gertrude, who, in shock of recognition, recovers her memory.

The minister awakens, and sees Gertrude with Jim. Gertrude follows Jim to the shore in the hope of recovering the money. The minister is overcome, but recovers and follows. Gertrude appeals to Jim, who laughs at her. The accomplice demands his share of the money. Jim refuses, is knocked into the water and drowns. The accomplice runs away, and the minister and Gertrude are left alone with Jim's body.

Gertrude confesses to the minister, who takes her in his arms.

MOTHER (Sept. 10).—The old mother is sitting at the organ playing and singing the song that is ever in her thoughts—"Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night?" The words of the song unfold themselves in visions of her boy when he was a little lad going to school and the days when he knelt at her knee, praying.

And as she sings she thinks of the time when he, an impetuous young man, gambled and drank too much, and of the night when his father, becoming angry at the boy's continued dissipation, ordered him from the house. Her mother's heart yearns for the boy who has never returned.

Later the father dies, and the mother, now grown very old, is forced to leave her home on account of debt. She goes to the city to search for her son. Her little store of money is soon exhausted and she is ejected from her boarding house.

She wanders out on the street, and as the Salvation Army comes by one girl notices her crying. The girl goes up to the old mother, and learning her story, takes her along to the Salvation Army Refuge.

The next day the mother marches the street with the Army, in hopes of finding her boy. They stop before the entrance of a saloon, and while the Army holds service, one of the members—the girl who rescued the old mother—enters the saloon.

The girl comes upon the boy in the saloon, where he has sought diversion upon the return from a long cruise. As the girl enters the boy is making sport of an old woman who has come in begging for a drink. The Salvation Army lass rebukes the boy, telling him that "somewhere you have a mother old and gray." The girl takes the old woman out to join the Army, leaving the boy thoroughly ashamed of his actions.

Outside, the mother asks the Army to sing her song—"Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight?"—and as they sing the boy, in the saloon, hears it and sees a vision of his mother as in the days of old. Attracted by the song, he goes out and recognizes his own mother. A happy reconciliation takes place.

GREAT NORTHERN

FADED BEAUTIES (Aug. 30).—Although this offering is listed as a comedy by the Great Northern Film Co., there is a sufficient element of pathos to make it doubly appealing. Major Kurt was a bachelor and devoted his time to tending his roses and paying his respects to the members of the Officers' Club. One pleasant afternoon he received a note saying:

DEAR MAJOR—When my father made me marry another I swore to remember you. I am now free again and will call to see you.

MARIE.

An old love dream was revived and once more the Major saw his first sweetheart of eighteen. He sends a telegram and at once sets out to visit the home of his former loved one. He has grown stout and there is little hair remaining on his head, but he dons his uniform and sallies forth to renew his old friendship. He calls at the club and confides in Adjutant Biff and then sets forth on his journey.

At Marie's home the mistress had caused herself to be dressed after the fashion of the forties, and her daughter Margerita was amused beyond limit. When the Major arrived at the house he espied Margerita on one of the upper balconies and, forgetting the lapse of time, mused "Marie is as beautiful as ever." It took some time to convince the old fellow of his mistake, but Margerita's fiancé soon convinces him. Then Marie appears on the scene and he becomes completely disillusioned. He was taken aback at her faded beauty, and after he had left the house without saying farewell, Marie in turn finds him asleep in the railway waiting room, and decides that he is not the hero she pictured him in her girlhood days. Stribolt is at his best in the role of Major Kurt, and the comedy throughout is splendidly staged and acted.

RETRIBUTION (Sept. 5).—Under the influence of "Nifty Jack" Logan, burglar, Nell O'Brien, herself having been partner to a few petty crimes, though now in honest employment, aids him to rob the house of her employer. Surprised in the act by Garry O'Neil, a young Central Office detective, who is visiting there, they are arrested and taken to court. Nifty is sentenced to two years, Nell to six months. Upon their being sentenced, Nifty vows to kill the detective upon his release. Six months later, Garry aids Nell to lead a better life, and eventually falls in love with her, though their love is not declared. Nell, prosperous and happy in her honest freedom, is surprised by the entrance into her apartment of Nifty, who has but lately made his escape from prison, and, as he vowed, comes to invoke her aid in his nefarious plot to do away with Garry O'Neil by means of an infernal machine. Nell refuses flatly to aid him, whereupon he vows to do the job himself. Leaving Nell bound and gagged in her apartment, he goes to the house of Garry O'Neil, surprises him, and acquaints him of the fact that he has but three minutes to live, leaving him alone with the machine which is to blow him into eternity. In the meantime Nell has freed herself from the bonds and rushes to the home of her only friend, reaching it in time to save his life, by throwing the machine through the window. The machine goes off, blowing in the side of the house, and the two lovers at last embrace and their love is declared unspoken. The smoke clears, and as they gaze out into the night they behold the form of the would-be assassin, Nifty, dangling from one of the timbers—dead.

RAMO

THE WORKER (Sept. 1).—Dissatisfied with conditions at Bradford Mills, the workers protest in vain against the long hours and starvation wages. James Bradford, the autocratic owner, repeatedly refuses to meet their demands, and the natural consequence is a threatened strike.

Bradford's son Jack, finding home associations disagreeable since his father's second marriage, goes to the city, and the gay life of the cafés and restaurants finds in him, wealthy and alone, a constant and somewhat reckless supporter. The father of Madge Drew, his fiancee, threatens to break off their engagement, and this, coupled with his father's illness and Madge's attitude, moves Jack to return home.

The strike is called. This, together with a bad heart attack brought on by the accidental shooting of Jameson, one of the most violent workers, causes Mr. Bradford's death. This state of affairs reaches Jack on his return, now, by his father's will, the owner of the mills and the bulk of his father's money. He straightway opens the mills and endeavors to relieve the dire poverty caused by the strike. Jack's stepmother, who is practically ignored by the will, plans with her brother to ruin Jack and dominate the mills.

Jack makes frequent rounds to the poverty-stricken section in his endeavor to better their conditions, the sickness of Mrs. Jameson's little child calling him frequently to her house. In this the stepmother sees an opportunity to strike at Jack through Jameson, counting on his jealousy, and she causes the false rumor concerning these visits to reach Jameson. She also shows an innocent letter from Mrs. Jameson to Jack torn by her so as to read like a love note. Jameson is fooled, and seeing Jack again with his wife, loses his head and attacks Jack.

Fearing a fatal result from his act, Jameson forces his way into the stepmother's house, seeking aid and protection from her, but she, frightened at his wild appearance and in the endeavor to evade him, falls down the stairs. Jameson, half dazed with this latest catastrophe, and Jack's unexpected appearance, is apprehended. Jack thereupon learns of Jameson's motive for the attack, and the stepmother, frightened and injured, admits the plot. Jameson returns to work at Jack's request, a stauncher and wiser worker. Jack receives full credit from Madge to keep his promise to be a worker.

ECLAIR

THE BANKER'S DAUGHTER (2 Parts) (Sept. 10).—George Van Borough finances an amusement enterprise which is as risky as its possible returns are large. This is known to his cashier, Upton Steele, who is madly in love with Blanche, his daughter. Blanche, however, finds the company of Harrison Barney far more interesting, for he is young, handsome and kindly. The children are devoted to Mr. Barney, whereas they fear Upton Steele ever since the day he threw Clara down when she tried to draw him into her childish games with her little brother.

When Steele finds out which way the wind of Blanche's affection blows he determines to get his rival, Harrison Barney, out of the way. While they are out on the lake adjoining Mr. Van Borough's estate he deliberately upsets the boat, knowing that Barney cannot swim. As he goes down for the last time Blanche rows to his rescue, and bravely carries him to the shore. Naturally, young Barney becomes devoted to her, but in his obscure position has little hope of winning out against her father's ambitions and her many wealthy suitors.

Baffled in his attempt to rid himself of Barney, Steele changes his plan of attack to the girl's father. He brazenly accuses the startled Mr. Van Borough of having acted rather indiscreetly in loaning a large sum on such flimsy securities as those of the amusement company, for a rumor to that effect would cause a run on the bank. Mr. Van Borough laughs at Steele's threats to start the rumor and precipitate a run unless Blanche will consent to have him. Blanche enters at that moment and makes the slim likelihood of Steele's winning her consent very apparent.

True to his threat, Steele precipitates the run, but Mr. Van Borough gathers together all his available securities and arranges to get a loan of $2,000,000 on them from a banker in the neighboring town. Mr. Van Borough takes the securities himself in a motor car, and has Blanche accompany him. Steele has learned the purpose of the trip, and arranges with thugs to hold up the banker and relieve him of the securities. They shoot the chauffeur, but brave little Blanche takes the wheel, travels a short cut to the ferry, and her father is enabled to deliver the securities to the banker who is to make the loan.

They decide to rest over night, and Blanche 'phones Barney to meet the party at Curley's Bend with loaded suitcases the next day. The message reaches him at his club, where Steele overhears enough to guess the new plans. Harrison Barney goes to the barn to get the suitcases, and is held up by Steele's thugs, who tie him securely. The Van Borough children, in playing around the barn, hear his struggles to release himself, and call a nearby farmer to his rescue. He borrows the farmer's old clothes, and drives off in a broken-down express, which is most unlikely to excite suspicion. Thus he outwits Steele's watching men, and meets the Van Borough auto as arranged.

The auto is held up by the thugs, after Barney had carried off the currency in his old wagon and arrived at the bank in time to display the mountain of money to the frenzied depositors and break the run. Steele's men make off with the loaded suitcases and are completely disgusted when, on opening them in a secluded nook, they find nothing but musty books instead of shining silver and gold and crisp greenbacks. The thugs are apprehended by the police, and tell of having been hired by Upton Steele to rob the banker.

At the banker's office, he is seated in a state of happy exhaustion, and has just presented to his cashier a letter reading: "In consideration of your efforts to assist the bank in its financial difficulties, you are awarded an unlimited vacation without salary. Harrison Barney is now cashier." Upton Steele turns in consternation and, when he sees Blanche clasped in his successor's arms, turns on his heel to leave the scene. He walks into the open arms of the officers who have come to arrest him. The Van Borough children come in and embrace their handsome new brother.

AMERICAN KINETO

IN A SERPENT'S COILS.—Seldom indeed is realism brought to such a fine art as in this magnificent story of treachery in the far-away lands of Lower California. The scene is laid on the edge of a desert on the Mexican border, a region where deadly snakes are found in thousands. A heart-rending struggle is shown between a woman and a whole colony of death-dealing reptiles.

John D. Braxton, metal king and collector of ores and naturalist trophies, is desirous of crossing the dreaded desert, and has sent for a reliable guide. Arriving at the tiny mining camp known as Simpson City, accompanied by many huge cases of specimens, he is an object of suspicion among the tougher element, and Joe Durton's gang of rustlers jump to the conclusion that Braxton's cases are filled with gold. The gang one morning pick up a dying teamster who is carrying a letter to Braxton, stating that the bearer is Jack Hawkes, a reliable guide. Durton determines to impersonate the dead guide and thus discover just what is contained in Braxton's heavy cases. He does this successfully, and is taken on as guide without any suspicion. Immediately on arrival Durton bribes one of Braxton's men to open a case and tell him what it contains. This man is promptly shot dead by Braxton, who warns everybody that interference with his affairs spells sudden death.

We are now introduced to the secret meeting place of the gang, where fiery crucibles are seen at work melting down the ill-gotten gains of the thieves. Here a letter is received from Durton calling upon his comrades to be in readiness for the forthcoming coup, and telling them that as this is his own particular scheme he demands a clear half of the proceeds.

Part 2 shows us the convoy proceeding over the dreary desert, and we see Durton's plan carried into effect. He breaks the convoy into two sections, whilst crossing a creek, and thus weakened, the half with which Braxton stays is quickly overcome by the gang. They take Braxton and his cases to a lonely shack and proceed to "bleed" him for $30,000 ransom, which Braxton, realizing the position he is in, promptly pays by check on a San Diego bank, warning them to on no account tamper with his baggage. When the check is handed out the bandits quarrel as to Durton's having a half share of this easily-won plunder, and send Bill Downs to collect the money. Durton imagines he will be left in the lurch, so sends for his wife to come and assist him in yet another scheme which has occurred to his fertile imagination—why not break open Braxton's cases and transfer the gold to some old gunnysacks? She can do this while he keeps the "boys" busy drinking upstairs. The cases are in the cellar and nobody can hear the noise of opening them when the door is tightly fastened. This part ends with Helena Durton riding off from her home to join Joe at the lonely shack.

In the third part we see Durton explaining his new scheme to Helena, and leading her down to the cellar wherein the cases are stored. Leaving his wife downstairs, Joe locks the door and rejoins his companions, telling them that he is now going to start a "real jag." The whole gang join in the festivities, and hour after hour slips by while they are drinking and dancing and playing cards. Meanwhile what has happened to Helena Durton, left in the cellar? Cautiously opening one of the cases she peeps inside and starts back with a cry of horror. The case is filled with huge deadly-fanged snakes! She quickly rushes to the door and batters against it, screaming loudly for help. But the gang do not hear, the door is too thick for sound to penetrate. The slimy reptiles draw nearer and nearer, and Helena retreats to an inner room of the cellar. The snakes worm their way after her. She fights and screams and struggles, but all to no avail. The deadly crawling reptiles see in Helena the embodiment of their natural enemy, man, and one, bolder than the others, gradually enfolds her in its tight embrace. Will help never come? Helena gradually gets weaker and weaker, until, as the snake raises its head and strikes her time and again with its envenomed tongue, the poor distracted woman faints.

Upstairs the fun is fast and furious, but at last the supply of liquor has given out. Durton has just written a letter to a jeweler ordering a lovely necklace for his wife. Little does he dream that she is lying unconscious in the room beneath with a living necklace encircling her throat. The ever-thirsty gang send one of their number to search the cellar in the hope that one more bottle may still be discovered. He finds Helena Durton almost in the last throes! Quickly she is brought to the upper room, and the millionaire naturalist is importuned to use his knowledge to save the woman's life. In spite of their treatment of him, Braxton administers a serum which counteracts the effect of the serpent's venom, and brings life back to Joe Durton's wife. Just then the messenger returns with the cash for Braxton's check. Durton seizes it and, in a wave of thankfulness and gratitude, hands it back to Braxton.

The story ceases with a reformed Joe Durton guiding the millionaire's convoy across the desert, and John Braxton once more in possession of all his money and naturalist specimen-cases.

SELIG

HOWLIN' JONES (Sept. 4).—Occasionally the first son of an English family wishes he were second, preferring the gay and easy life to the pressure of a coronet, and many an available candidate for the house of peers has quietly slipped away to some far corner of the earth to lose himself in preference to entering the world of politics and submit to the irksome conventions of its social obligations. So it came about that Howland-Jones (who is in reality Lord Howland) comes to America, incognito, and slides down into the great lone land of Arizona, to try himself out, get next to the people, and incidentally a lot of other "varmints," and try to earn his own living at some occupation not quite as laborious as golf or as dangerous as polo, as extravagant as baccarat, or as asinine as sitting in the club windows, watching the ladies crossing Piccadilly on rainy days.

The English lordling has the "h's" in his name dropped by the cowboys on the Diamond S ranch and becomes known as "Owlin' Jones," but after he gets rid of his monocle, his tweenies (hideous checked knickerbockers that fit only in fancy), the switch-cane and the monkey-cap (a remnant of his grenadier days), and climbs into general store overalls (equally good, going or coming), fitted with bachelor buttons, and guaranteed to stand the strain of any bucker, he begins to attract more respect in the eyes of the good-naturedly scornful. They try him out as a joke by putting him unwittingly on a bucking horse, but he turns the tables on them as he directs the bucker their way and keeps his seat in the fashion that surprises the most hardened broncho buster. They find out that although he is a lord "a man is a man for a' that," for he manages to outdo them at most of their athletic stunts and takes to the country like one to the manor born, and although he is the stature of a man, he settles down to grow up with it, for the love of the new land he has found so congenial.

FEENY'S SOCIAL EXPERIMENT (Sept. 1).—Feeny is a hard-working coal-stoker. One day while in port he happens to attend a meeting at which several millionaires address the people on how to accumulate money. "When you see the opportunity grasp it" is impressed vividly on Feeny's brain. He buys books on political economy and interests his friends in this subject.

That season they embark as stokers on board the palatial yacht of Mac Candlish the head speaker at the meeting attended by Feeny. He has several friends aboard and all prepare for a jolly cruise. But the boat strikes a rock and is totally wrecked. The stokers get the millionaires ashore on a distant island and prepare to take care of them. Then Feeney remembers, "When you see the opportunity, grasp it." He gets an idea and calls his comrades together in consultation. Next day the millionaires find a rudely-erected hotel, well stocked with supplies from the wreck, on the island, owned and run by the stokers, who have made themselves the sole food capitalists of the place. The rich men are forced to pay dearly for everything they eat, and, as they cannot starve, they finally submit. Mac Candlish, in rebellion, refuses to give in, and in a fugitive state of hunger steals the "hotel" garbage can. Feeny takes it away from him forcibly and points out to him where he is wrong.

About two weeks later they are all picked up by a passing steamer, and down below decks Feeny and his mates share a fat bankroll, showing that they certainly "grasped the opportunity when they saw it."

BETWEEN HOME AND COUNTRY (Sept. 8).—During the Civil War Captain Ward, a Southern officer, enters the Northern camp and manages to steal some plans. He is followed by a posse. When he reaches his own home he goes in, thinking to throw them off the scent. His wife and two children anxiously watch at the windows. Suddenly the little boy spies the Northern men approaching and warns his father. As the soldiers draw up at the porch Ward and his wife lock the front door and retreat to the library.

The men break through into the main hall and, seeing the closed door of the library, commence to batter it down. Ward's wife suggests that he don a gown of hers while she puts on his cap and coat. As the men dash into the room they pay no attention to the huddled form of a woman bending over her children, but follow what they suppose to be Ward into the next room, allowing the soldier to escape by a rear door. The men soon discover their mistake and start after Ward. The officer in command remains, however, and attempts to make love to the wife, who is alone and unprotected.

Her little son, realizing her danger, runs from the house to his father's hiding place. He tells Ward, who for a moment hesitates. He does not know whether to go ahead with the plans or back to save his wife. Love conquers and he returns to the house, where he knocks the Northern officer down. The boy rides on to the Southern camp and warns them of his father's peril. A party of soldiers is sent back with him, and they arrive in time to put the Northern men to rout. Then Ward triumphantly hands the plan to his general, glad he has been able to fulfil his duty to his country as well as to his wife.

WHO KILLED GEORGE LAMBERT? (3 Reels) (Aug. 31).—Mr. Beck a financier, called away on business, tells his wife that he may be obliged to write for money, but does not care to take any large amount of money with him—she can bring it to him if he finds it necessary. A fortnight later, as Mrs. Beck is going out to dinner, a letter is brought to her in which her husband explains that it is essential he should receive $5,000 by the midday following. She is to bring the money in bills to a house indicated at Gardon, to which the most direct route is by rail to Vinay, thence by motor. Mrs. Beck is rather puzzled by the message, but, deciding to go, shortly afterwards starts on the journey. By the same train there travels a bank clerk, carrying $10,000 in gold bills. George Lambert is the name of the bank clerk.

At 11 o'clock the train reaches Vinay, the only travelers to Gardon being Mrs. Beck and George Lambert. A few miles along the road the automobile breaks down, and it is with difficulty that the nearest inn is reached. Here it is definitely ascertained that the repairs are too complicated to complete before morning, and the innkeeper regrets that he cannot supply a carriage for some hours. Mrs. Beck and George Lambert are accommodated in adjoining rooms. Lambert makes the best of a bad job and quickly goes to sleep, but Mrs. Beck is restless. She hears a trap being driven into the inn yard and makes a bargain with the driver to take her to Gardon immediately at a very early hour in the morning. Upon her arrival Mrs. Beck finds Gardon House, where she expected to meet her husband is uninhabited. She is faced by a mystery.

At 7 a. m. the auto is in shape again, but the innkeeper finds the lady gone and the clerk lying dead in bed. Later the police arrive. They decide that the bank clerk was suffocated with chloroform, and a quantity of saturated cotton wool is found in Mrs. Beck's room. In the wallet in which the bank-notes were carried is a list of the stolen bills, with numbers, and all of which were for large amounts.

Hearing that Mrs. Beck went to Gardon, the officials proceed thither, and when confronted Mrs. Beck declines to explain her presence in the village, and although the discovery in her handbag of notes stolen from the bank clerk takes her by surprise, she still refuses to explain. She vigorously defends herself against the accusation of murder, but is arrested forthwith.

Mr. Beck has completed his business and returns home, en route reading of the arrest of his wife. His home is searched, and the letter which led Mrs. Beck to start for Gardon with the money is declared by him a forgery. The police have followed the clue of the chloroform bottle left behind and the original prescription, which the doctor denies having written. Beck is struck by a resemblance in the writing, and it is at once seen that the letter received by his wife and the prescription are the work of the same hand. Mystery thus succeeds mystery. The original receiver of the chloroform is traced and arrested, and plucking off his false beard and mustache, we see he is the driver of the auto from Vinay to the inn. Beck's valet had informed him that Mrs. Beck had followed the letter's instructions, and his intention was to stupefy her while in the car, but Lambert's arrival upset his plan. When all was quiet he drugged the clerk and removed the bank-notes, then when Mrs. Beck left the room to talk to the driver of the cart he seized the opportunity to go in her room. He changed the notes he stole from the clerk for those carried by Mrs. Beck, but left the bottle and some cotton wool behind him. He states that it was not his intention to kill George Lambert, but an overdose of chloroform was responsible for this.

C. LANG COBB IN NEW OFFICES

C. Lang Cobb, of the Cobb Motion Picture Bureau, has taken a suite of offices at 703-704 Columbus Theatre Building, New York City. Mr. Cobb will also conduct the business of Ramo sales and publicity matters at this address.

C. LANG COBB

In conversation with a News representative, he said that the principal advantages to be gained by the removal will be to have more time to keep in close touch with the Cobb Motion Picture Bureau, and also a convenient location for meeting and transacting the business of the Ramo Company with the numerous out-of-town buyers.

"DANIEL"

An Extraordinary Picture by the Vitagraph Company

"Daniel in the Lions' Den" and "The Children of Israel in the Fiery Furnace" were never put to a severer test than the Vitagraph players who took part in "The Life of Daniel" under the direction of Director Fred Thomson, in the production of this marvellously beautiful portrayal of the man who stood steadfast in his trust in the true and only God. The making of this picture is not only an extraordinary undertaking, but an exceedingly expensive one. Specially designed for it, was the Fiery Furnace built from historic data, after careful research. It is represented in the form of a gigantic bull's head, the interior of which contains the blazing fiery furnace in which Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego proved their unflinching trust in the God of their Fathers. From the furnace they step forth unscorched, not so much as a hair of their heads being singed. Much ingenuity was exercised in showing this feature of the picture. It was so real in its taking that one could not believe it possible they were witnessing it. We can really see the Children of Israel in the midst of the great flames which shoot out from the door of the furnace and from the nostrils and eyes of the great head of the beast, which the Assyrians held so sacred among their many false gods.

"Daniel in the Lions' Den" is even more realistically thrilling. Charles Kent, of the Vitagraph players, who takes the part of "Daniel" in this scene, intrepidly enters the den of ferocious lions who at first greet him with snarls and gnashing of their teeth, but in accordance with the Biblical records of the story, they become as calm and harmless as kittens as he prayerfully stands among them.

The producing of these two scenes involved a large expenditure of money in the building of the scenes, the securing of the animals and the time involved. These two scenes cost The Vitagraph Company not less than $10,000. More than 500 extra persons besides the Vitagraph players were employed in them. Another scene of great dramatic power is "The Dream of Nebuchadnezzar," when he sees the enormous statue of gold and silver and watches it break in thousands of pieces at the climax of his vision. The construction of this statue cost over $800. It was first modeled in clay, then cast in plaster. Over half a ton of plaster was used. It was twenty feet high and necessarily completely destroyed in carrying out the description of the vision.

Again we must compliment the Vitagraph Company for their readiness to comply with the existing demands of the public. We are assured of the success and popularity of "Daniel," when we call to mind the first real Biblical subject ever produced, "The Life of Moses," in five reels. It has never been equalled. Nothing has been spared on "The Life of Daniel" to make it thorough in authenticity of detail and correctness in every particular.

George Kleine announces receipt of advance material on the wonderful seven-reel Cines' subject "Antony and Cleopatra." This is the extraordinary subject selected by Cines to follow the success of "Quo Vadis" and, needless to say, it is a fitting sister to that master film.
